THE WHITE EAGLE OF POLAND.

Red of the snowy crest, I fain would see thee,
Again amid thy brethern of the sky!
Low in the dust th' oppressor's chain hath bound thee,
But crushed and wounded, thou canst never die!

Freedom's own child, who dreams that thou canst perish,
While one true son of Poland clasps a sword!
Tyrants may mock, but we thy fame will cherish
Till thy departed glory be restored.

Come for a season, hide thy glittering pinions,
Within the temple of our pride and trust!
Its goddess smiles on thee,—but spurns the minion
Whose knee, in base submission, meets the dust!

Poland! thy fame, thy deeds of martial glory
Shall, on the ark of freedom, long preside;
We love thy name, thy old heroic story,
Those are our prayers whatever ills betide!

CHAPTER V.

"He seemed
For dignity composed and high exploit
But all was false and hollow, though his tongue Dropped manna."—Paradise Lost.

We left Colonel Harcourt and his niece immediately after the return of the party of dragoons which had pursued Ernest. A half hour had scarcely elapsed when the scene was further enlivened by the approach of a still larger body of men, headed by an officer whose face struck Colonel Harcourt as not unfamiliar. The announcement of his guest's name removed every shadow of doubt from Colonel Harcourt's mind, and he greeted the young officer heartily as Captain Stanley, the son of a favorite old companion in arms.

"What!—Colonel Harcourt of whom I have heard my father so often speak—" exclaimed the stranger in reply. "Ah! this is indeed a happy meeting. Little did I think that I should meet here one to whom my parent has had he was indebted for his first lessons in arms. I need not ask, whether the loyalty of so gallant an officer, notwithstanding the occurrence of which I have heard," but noticing the look of anguish which shot over the face of the father at these words, though the expression faded even more rapidly than it came, he continued, "However, I seek no explanation. If the king had more such servants as you, my dear sir, this rebellion would soon expire for want of fuel."

"Say no more—" said the old man with dignity, every shade of anguish passing from his face, "I will not hide from you that the fugitive is my son, but sure he has turned traitor to his monarch he is no more my child. He must meet the fate he has brought on himself."

"Nay—" began Stanley.

"Excuse me," said the parent, interrupting him, "we will change the subject," and a melancholy smile passed over his face. The guest saw that it would not do to press the matter further, and so led the conversation adroitly into other channels. The two officers were soon engaged in an interesting tête-a-tête, which remained uninterrupted till the evening meal was almost prepared, when Edith, recovered from her late agitation, and looking more lovely than ever, entered the room. At the sight of so beautiful an apparition, Captain Stanley rose and bowed, and speedily detaching himself from his host, established his chair by the side of Edith. Nor did he fail to interest her, difficult as was the undertaking at that moment. Indeed few men were so fascinating as Captain Stanley. Anecdote, wit, sentiment and poetry were made to contribute to his hearer's amusement, and the whole was spoken with that air of refinement, that easy indescribable grace which is always characteristic of one who has mingled as an equal in the most polished society. Then he had one of those low, musical voices; and his whole demeanor was irresistably frank. His beauty was manly and of the highest order. Altogether he was a companion such as Edith had rarely met with, and the skill with which he addressed his conversation to her peculiar mood of mind, soon drew her into an animated conversation which was protracted to the usual hour of retirement. As he sat between Colonel Harcourt and Edith, now lamenting the sad war which divided brother from brother, and now enlivening the evening with gay sallies of the Court of St. James, even the veteran, used as he had been to society, thought that he had never listened to a companion so entertaining. Yet notwithstanding all, Edith felt as if there was something about Stanley which repelled confidence, and she found herself more than once scrutinizing his remarks with a suspicion that appeared as unjust as it was unaccountable. Still she could not direct herself of this feeling. Were not the old sages right, when they said that, at our first meeting with those who are to influence our fate, we experience an admiration or antipathy, just as they are to be our good or evil genius!

Stanley's was a character often met with in the atmosphere of courts, where the high finish of factitious politeness covers hearts of the most depraved nature. In early life he had been placed in the army, and left wholly to his own guidance, with talents and appearance to make him fashionable, and high passions to tempt him continually to evil. He grew up dissolute, selfish and unprincipled, without one redeeming feature in his character. In his conduct to inferiors he was controlled by no principal honour or divinity. For female virtue he had no more respect than his fellow believers in the fashionable French school of morality, and in his narrower sphere he evinced all the licentiousness of the infamous Duke of Orleans or that royal voluptuary Louis the fifteenth. With a handsome appearance, and manners the most fascinating, Stanley had been enabled more than once to triumph over female innocence; and indeed on no point was his vanity more susceptible than in regard to his power over the sex. To his equals, however, he assumed that chivalrous courtesy which belonged to the Bayards of his age. Thus he had two characters, a real and a fictitious one, and perhaps in nothing was his acknowledged ability more perceptible than in the ease with which he assumed the false character, and maintained it consistently down to the minutest detail. Even Colonel Harcourt, whom few men could have deceived, regarded his young guest as possessing not only the high finish of a gentleman of the day, but the strength and rectitude of principle which the old loyalist deemed even more important.

The hour was late when the little group separated for the evening. Stanley retired to his allotted chamber, and, as his servant was occupied in the usual duty of a valet, he said to this individual, who made it his business to pander to all his master's vices and who was a fit minion on such an employer.

"A rare beauty, John, I have found here in these woods. By Jove! one would never have thought of seeking for a mistress in a place like this;" and then, as his servant looked up with an air of importance, the master continued—"You have been at your business, I see, you knave—what have you picked up!"

The servant then proceeded to relate what he had learned in the kitchen respecting the family history for the last two years. He concluded by saying,

"So, your honor seen, this niece will get all the money, the son being disinherited. A pretty pill it is, too, they tell me in the hall."

"I know that," said Stanley, "I have often heard my father speak of Colonel Harcourt as a very wealthy man, and but three remove from an earldom. I, faith, his niece will be a prize," he continued, and then fell into a reverie. After several minutes of silence he looked up and said,

"By George, what a sensation she would create in court! I'm in love with this angel, John!"

"So your honor says of them all," quietly responded the valet.

"But I'm serious now. Besides, funds have got deucedly low, and I must replenish somehow. If I could get this old fellow's estate, I wouldn't mind taking it encumbered with the niece. The son's out of the way entirely."

"But they say below that the young folks have a sort of affection for each other, and I heard something of an engagement, though it appears the Colonel knows nothing of it, and thinks their liking is only cousinly, your honor."

"Pshaw! these are straws, you villain, and you know it. No woman ever yet could resist a certain Captain Stanley, if he determined to win her love. Bah! it's a plain game. I must be all that is loyal, high-principled, courteous, and dignified to the old man; and for the niece I must sympathize now and then with these rebels, and pay her whatever attention I shall find her character and opinions may require," and with these words he dismissed his servant for the night.

The next morning, no one would have discovered, in the graceful and refined officer who paid the compliments of the day to Edith, the same individual who had on the preceding evening, called his valet into his counsel. The conversation, at the breakfast table, ranged over a great variety of subjects,—but was principally shared between Stanley and his host. Edith looked pale and was silent, notwithstanding Stanley exerted his utmost skill to draw her out from her reserve. It was clear that a battle was at hand, in which Ernest perhaps might fall. Besides the malediction of her uncle which had placed an impassable barrier between her and Ernest, yet rung in her ears; and though she was resolved to follow the course which her duty pointed out, yet the sacrifice of her dearest affection, was not made without a struggle. Unwilling that her uncle should divine her sorrow, she had borne up on the preceding evening, but when she retired to her chamber, she gave free vent to her tears. All night she had wept and prayed alternately. She felt indeed that for her the spring of life was broken—and that henceforth existence would be a dark and dreary waste. Towards morning, exhausted nature had inserted her claim, and the poor girl fell into a broken slumber, which, however, yielded her little relief. No wonder, therefore, that she appeared at the breakfast table pale and dispirited. Luckily her uncle attributed her languid looks to her temporary illness on the preceding day. Even if he had known the full extent of Edith's sufferings, his false notions of duty would have prevented him from recalling the cause with which he had visited him on. His stern loyalty would sooner have laid both his children in the grave, than have suffered him to purchase their happiness by overlooking what he deemed the treason of Ernest. God knows! this is indeed a world of sin, when a parent can act thus, and think he does aright.

"We must be in the saddle at once," said Stanley, when the morning meal was finished; "I need not tell you that a battle, Colonel Harcourt, is at hand. Nor need I ask on whose side your prayers will be—may I speak as sincerely of those of your sweet niece?" and he has to turned smiling to Edith. She crimsoned to the brow, and answered in embarrassment. But the aim of Stanley had been gained. He saw that his valet had born right when he stated that the affections of Edith were pre-engaged.

"I will not be foiled though," thought the young officer, "for I have never yet met with a defeat, when I resolved to conquer. No, this proud beauty shall be mine—the more, because she seems somewhat to slight me. What! shall I yield to a raw country rebel, as this hopeful son of my host is? Never! Come weal or woe Edith Ellison shall be mine."

But though these thoughts were passing through his mind, his manner continued as bland as ever, and he rode away gaily after his company, the beau ideal of a gallant officer. His last words were,

"Pray remember, Colonel, that we quarter next week in Philadelphia, where I hope to meet you and your lovely nieces, for I much fear that your situation, if you remain here, will expose you to many annoyances, which the king's troops, however much they may try, cannot wholly prevent. But in Philadelphia you will be among friends, and Sir William especially will be pleased at your presence. After we have taken the capital, the war must speedily come to an end. Then you can return, if you so wish, to this enchanting spot; though I flatter myself that, in the meantime, means may be found to retain your valuable services in the pacification of the colonies."

"I have myself thought of what you say," answered his host, "and as the country around me is highly disaffected, and as I shall enjoy less peace than ever after this day's work, I shall adopt your suggestion. For Edith's sake, if not for my own, I would avoid the distraction of this contest; and in Philadelphia, if anywhere, we can enjoy quiet."

"Right glad am I to hear your determination. But there goes the trumpet, and Cornwallis must be already on the road. Ere night we hope to scatter the rebel army to the four winds of heaven. Ah! your fair niece I see is at the window—so I will waive sending my compliments," and kissing his hand to Edith, and bowing his head until the plumes of his helmet mingled with his horse's mane, Stanley leade his host again farewell, and galloped forward to overtake his company, the last of which, by this time, had attained the turn in the road.

We have already narrated the events of that day. Edith heard, with a trembling heart, the distant cannonade; and her evening was spent in prayer and tears; for the excitement which reigned in the house prevented any one from thinking of their ordinary meals. Late in the evening, one of the men servants, who had been despatched for information, brought intelligence of the defeat of the Americans, with an exaggerated account of their losses. Poor Edith! how her heart beat as he narrated the story, for she feared, at every pause, the next word would tell of her lover's fall. But she was doomed to remain in uncertainty. That night she retired, ignorant whether Ernest was alive or dead. Ah! little do we know of the agony suffered, after battle, by those, who, ignorant of the fate of a husband, father or lover, hope and yet dread the worst.

The feelings of the father we shall not pretend to analyze. They were of a mixed and contradictory character. He experienced many yearnings of affection for his son, and was not without curiosity to learn his fate, but these feelings he soon brought into subjection to his stern sense of what he considered his duty.

"No," he said to himself, as he paused in the middle of his chamber, which he had been pacing for some time, "I cannot longer indulge these feelings. My duty to my king and to my God is imperative; and it must be performed at whatever sacrifice to my own selfish love. A traitor!—from this hour I shut him out from my heart and thoughts. He has departed from his father's faith and house, and he is no more a child of mine. And yet," continued the old man, a gush of natural emotion asserting its supremacy, "and yet oh! Absalom my son—oh! Absalom," and bursting into tears he wept like David of old.

And Ernest!—as he lay in his cloak, the night after the battle, and saw the stars shining calmly high up in heaven, how his thoughts reverted to the happy hours, now gone forever, when he and Edith gazed together on those same bright luminaries. Alas! such moments of felicity would never be his again. An exile from his father's heart, with an impassable barrier between him and his cousin, what further had he to hope or live for in this world? Nothing, but a glorious death, won in the foremost ranks of his country's array. For him beaten forth, that country should be home, parent, mistress, all. Then thought the young soldier. Ah! how little of human charity would have contained happiness to those three hearts, now pining in misery.

CHAPTER VI.

Iago.—I see this hath a little dashed your spirits.
Othello.—Not a jot, not a jot.

We shall not follow the evolutions of the hostile armies during the fortnight that elapsed between the Battle of Brandywine, and the entrance of Sir William Howe into Philadelphia. It is sufficient for our purpose to say, that neither Congress, nor Washington, considered that battle decisive, and it was resolved to risk another blow for the safety of the Capital. Accordingly the army was marched from Chester, through Darby, and over the Schuylkill bridge, to its old position near the falls of that river. The National Legislature passed vigorous resolutions for reinforcing the army, and the commander-in-chief was directed to complete as rapidly as possible, the defences of the Delaware. After repassing for a day, the American force was again put in motion, and pushed forward on the Lancaster road to gain the left wing of the enemy, with the intention of giving him battle. When, however, Washington reached the Warren tavern, twenty-three miles from Philadelphia, his scouts brought in intelligence that Howe was approaching in two columns, and accordingly, surrendering as impossible, the attempt to occupy the ground he had originally contemplated, the American commander resolved to meet his enemy in front. The advanced parties had already met, and there was some smart skirmishing going on when a heavy storm set in, effectually concealing the combatants from each others' sight, and putting an end to the contest. The rain fell in torrents, the wind blew fiercely and incessantly, the gullies ran with torrents of water, and the roads and fields were so heavy as to be almost impassable. This interference of nature prevented the resumption of the contest. It was soon found, moreover, that the gun-locks from being badly secured, and the cartridges from the boxes being inartificially constructed, had been rendered unfit for use; and under these circumstances a retreat was ordered, which was kept up all day, and most of the night, the cold, biting rain continuing without intermission. When at length the army reached the Yellow Springs, wet, disjointed and worn out, it was found that scarcely a market in a regiment was fit for use. Had the enemy pursued the retiring patriots, the whole army must have fallen a prey to the royal general. But that Providence who presides over the destinies of nations, and who had the children of Israel with a cloud by day, and fire by night, did not desert Washington in this extremity, but suffered his retreat to pass unobserved or unmolested.

The discovery of the want of ammunition induced the commander-in-chief to retreat on French creek, around which past a series of evolutions took place that resulted in the crossing of the Schuylkill by the British, below the American position. It was while these manœuvres were in the course of execution, that the division of Wayne, then lying in Chester, was surprised by orders to Sir William Howe by some of the disaffected inhabitants, and a party under the command of General Gray detached, who surprised his enemy, driving in the American picquets with charged bayonets, and slaughtering many of the troops in their beds. Home, having now got between Washington and Philadelphia, the capture of the Capital inevitably followed. On the twenty-sixth of September, exactly a month and a day after having landed at the head of Elk, the British army entered Philadelphia as conquerors, filling the patriotic inhabitants with gloom, and producing a correspondent exultation on the part of those who were hostile to liberty.

During these transactions Stanley, though occupied often in the field, did not forget the project he had formed respecting Edith's hand. Her ample fortune influenced his mercenary feelings, while her beauty had produced an effect on him such as he thought impossible. It was not love, however,—that pure and holy emotion which angels might entertain—which he experienced for Edith. The passion that had taken possession of his bosom was of a far grosser character, and sought only for the gratification of his baser nature. He seized every opportunity and these were by no means rare, while the army remained in the open country, to visit her, under pretence of renewing with Col. Harcourt the old family intercourse. With the uncle he was always a welcome, and finally a favored visiter. In what light Edith regarded him it was more difficult for him to discover. No one, however, could have played his part more adroitly than Stanley, and had not Edith already given her affections to another, it is possible that the graceful manners and high principles of Stanley might have won an interest in her heart. But her love for Ernest, though concealed with maiden modesty, and as yet wholly unobserved by her uncle, could not escape the scrutiny of Stanley, especially after his suspicions had been aroused by his valet, and by her embarrassment on the morning of the battle. He had flattered himself, at first, that her preference for Ernest would soon yield before his arts, but, after repeated visits to Harcourt Hall, he was forced to confess his total want of success.

"By heaven! I will not thus be foiled," he exclaimed, one evening as he sat alone in his room, "this lovely creature must be, aye! shall be mine, even if all hell should oppose me. I am well nigh desperate in my finances, and her fortune would set me right with a single stroke of the pen. The union is favorable, and then there is only this cursed cousin, this young whelp of a rebel in my way. I see," he continued, knitting his brow, and grinding his teeth passionately together, "that she loves him, I see this wholly, and that effectually no hope of winning her as long as he lives. Would that I had him here, his body and my cold steel should soon be acquainted." And then for a minute he was silent. "I might forget all, but I love this girl—aye! how madly and devotedly God knows. By what strange fascination has she attained this power over me? I, who have withstood the charms of the fair ladies of St. James, and smiled on the gay Parisian dames, to become the idolater of a country girl, brought up in a province, with no tutor but a mariner old uncle, and no companion but a most confide in me. I do not understand your game though I see by your countenance that something pains you."

"Oh!" replied Margaret, bursting into tears, "it is not about me, but you, my dear mistress; and therefore I weep the more to think how you would soothe me, and that I cannot do the same for you, but must break your heart by telling you what I have heard."

"Now, for the love of heaven, speak!" said Edith dreadfully agitated, "has any thing happened to Ernest? Tell me all—I can bear it. Is he dead?"

"No, no—not that."

"Then," said Edith with a long breath, as if relieved from some dreadful suspense. "Is he wounded!"

"No—he is unhurt; but—but."

"Speak, I command you."

Thus urged, Margaret whispered a few words in the ear of Edith, which drove the color instantaneously from her cheek, and prostrated her, the next moment, fainting on the floor.

"Oh! I have killed her—I have murdered my dear mistress," said Margaret wildly. "Never ought I to have told her the dreadful tale, and yet how could I keep that secret which was burning my heart like red-hot iron, oh!" she continued, unheeding Edith's stays, and sprinkling her pale face with water, "speak and forgive me, dear, dear mistress."

For a long time the passionate entreaties, and the trembling though assiduous efforts of the girl were in vain, but, at length, Edith slowly opened her eyes with a sigh and looked around her. It was still some moments before she was fully restored, when Margaret began to beg forgiveness what for she had told.

"There is no need of forgiveness," said Edith with a smile. "You did what I commanded you and what was perfectly proper. Say nothing of this," and then, after a moment's pause, she said with a flushing eye and curling lip, "—to hard with the most depraved of earth, and boast to them that he has Edith Ellison at his beck!" and again her voice and look changed as she continued, "Oh! I could not have believed this from other lips. But what motive could this trooper have to deceive Margaret! Alas! alas! it is too true."

LINES UPON LETTERS.

BY R. SIMMONS.

"In his last hours, as he opened a note which his servant brought to him, he said, 'An odd thought strikes me: shall receive no letters in the grave.'"—BOSWELL'S Life of Johnson.

Yes—and the unutterable dread
With which hath Flesh and Spirit shrink,
When the stern Angel of the Dead
Impediments the Future's brink—
While all is hurry, doubt, dismay,
Life's floating crumbling fast away,
And cold, lone silent, dark and dull,
Across the memory flitting yell,
Even then that Sage's transient thought
Some pangs at least the soul can save,
For he what may our awful lot,
No letters reach us in the grave.

Letters from Home—we've sighed at last
A longing lingering watch to keep,
And when th' expected past is past
And brings them not, to shrink and weep.
And count how many hours remain
Before that post comes round again
Or hitherto still to break the seals,
Sick for the love no line reveals,
Bearing to wrest cold Duty's wards
To hoard here tenderness and truth,
As if existence shatter'd should
Could yield the music of our youth!

A Patron's letters—never more
To feel them much our honors prize,
With all the hard denouncers of vote—
The cutor—in using long to hide.
Neere again to know th' intense
And fierceish anguish of suspense,
When the cool, final, blast comes
As yet suspend it, meets the eye
One moment more—and all we dread!

Stanley's letters, there had been an expression of blank wonder on his face, as if he was unable to divine the exact drift of his instructions, but now, the look of uncertainty broke away, and he emitted a long, low whistle, unchecked by his superior's presence. Stanley could not avoid a smile; while the trooper gave way to a smothered laugh.

"You understand me," said Stanley.

"I do; and it's the very devil's trick you've hit upon. When! I might have thought it it for months, and such a plan wouldn't have occurred to me. But this comes of blood and breeding I suppose. Howsomever, I'm ready, and can win the game hi trumps now. I'll be as thick as ale with Mistress Margaret—that's her name I believe—long before this time to-morrow night."

"I know you could be depended on; and here's a couple of guineas for you. Your services shall be doubled when your tale reaches the proper ears."

"Ay! I understand. This Lieutenant Harcourt is as dissolute a knave as there is in the American camp," he continued with an ironical smile, "and boasts high and low of his conquests in which he stands in the eyes of a certain Mistress Edith Ellison."

"By St. George, your wit is on the spur, that is the very tale to answer my purposes. But go now. Be silent and speedy. Introduce the subject adroitly, and the guineas are yours."

"By ——," said Stettson, as he left the door, "was there ever such an infernal villain! I have done dirty work for him before, but nothing as black as this. Why the devil himself would be ashamed to win a mistress by such means. However it is all the same to me, for me gold to buy pleasure and I will do the fiend's bidding. Guineas don't rain every day, and the girl must marry somebody I suppose. There are other ways of killing a dog besides choking him to death with bread and butter," and with this proverb he left the house, and broke into a popular song, as he wended his way towards his quarters.

Stanley watched the trooper's figure until the door closed behind it, when that triumphant, mocking smile again broke on his fine features. He poured out a goblet of wine and began sipping it complacently.

"Ah!" he said at long intervals, putting the glass on the table, "I have check-mated my rival. To what divinity am I indebted for this lucky thought! A day or two to let the poison work; and then the field will be clear before me. To-morrow I will be all that the fair Edith's imagination can desire, so that when at night, she hears of her lover's supposed perfidy, she will contrast us together, with all due allowances in my favor. Then, in a few days, I will return, and having already won the first place in her uncle's favor, propose in due form for her hand. Time, Colonel Harcourt's persuasion, and pique at her lover's conduct will do the rest; and then, when once she is mine, she cannot help but love me."

The next day, pursuant to his plan, Stanley rode over to Harcourt Hall attended by Stetson instead of his usual valet. He was received with marked favor by the Colonel, while Edith appeared to listen to him with more than usual interest. Never indeed had Stanley appeared to more advantage in her eyes; and when she retired for the night, the thought unwittingly came into her bosom, that next to Ernest, the English captain was certainly the most agreeable of men. Stanley, with a perfection of art to which only he could have attained, relying on the shock she was to receive on retiring, had taken occasion, when her uncle was out for a few moments, to mention incidentally, and as if she would look on it only as a piece of common news, that her cousin had come in with a flag of truce the preceding day and was well. This information lightened the anxious heart of Edith, and she entered her chamber singing gaily.

"Well, Margaret, why so sad!" she said playfully to her maid, who filled also the place of a humble companion.

"Alas! Mistress Edith, I have heard that which makes me sad. But I ought not to mention it to you, surely. Oh! that there ever should be deceivers," and the girl betrayed unusual distress.

"But what is all this about?" said Edith, kindly taking Margaret's hand. "You have no sister and I must confide in me. I do not understand your game though I see by your countenance that something pains you."

"Oh!" replied Margaret, bursting into tears, "it is not about me, but you, my dear mistress; and therefore I weep the more to think how you would soothe me, and that I cannot do the same for you, but must break your heart by telling you what I have heard."

"Now, for the love of heaven, speak!" said Edith dreadfully agitated, "has any thing happened to Ernest? Tell me all—I can bear it. Is he dead!"

"No, no—not that."

"Then," said Edith with a long breath, as if relieved from some dreadful suspense. "Is he wounded!"

"No—he is unhurt; but—but."

"Speak, I command you."

FROM THE LADY'S BOOK, FOR AUGUST.

CHARITY OF THE WORLD.

BY LOUIS FITZGERALD TASISTRO.

A brilliant society was assembled in the drawing-room of the famous banker Fitz Harding, one of the fortunate millionaires of Belgrave Square. Seven had struck, and a servant in gorgeous livery had uttered those words so sweet to the ear of the impatient gastronome, "dinner is on the table."

I shall not describe the dining-room of a millionaire—the sanctuary within which are labored out so many conceptions and projects, so many revolutionists, financial and political. Neither will I describe the total magnificence of a feast which might have shamed those of Lucullus. Let it suffice to state, that Fitz Harding, on that day, did the honors of his table to a foreign diplomatist, whose protection he sought for the contribution of a loan to the secretary-general of a ministerial department, whose position enabled him to facilitate the application of a great enterprise; and to three personal members of parliament, whose vote might have the effect of enriching his native country with a canal, which should point abundance and fertility into the coffers of the insatiable contractor. And this short enumeration of the principal guests is equivalent to the bill of fare.

Lady Emily Fitz Harding, blazing with diamonds, and brilliant in youth and beauty, presided with grace and freedom. Amiable and smiling, she replied with equal address to the flatteries of the secretary-general, and the madrigals of the foreign diplomatist. Every one was in the happiest vein. Sallies of fancy flew about with champagne corks; the provincial members were as noisy as during one of O'Connell's speeches; and the banker himself was almost a wit.

All things had been discussed, and all subjects exhausted, from Bulwer's last novel to Mrs. Trollope's amusing impertinences, (in addition to those of the loan, the contract and the canal,) when the conversation fell on the subject of benevolence, connected with a charitable ball, a fancy-ball which was to collect together the flower of London society. Lady Fitz Harding was one of the lady patronesses of this great ball, which was to take place within a fortnight. Many sayings were uttered, wise and foolish, on the subject of charity, of the pain, of dancing philanthropy, and benevolence in entrechats—that great invention of modern times. The tear shed in Fitz Harding's eye as he spoke of the families of the indigent, was the most touching testimony to his sensibility of the rich. As for Lady Emily, she was sublime. Of what value was opulence but to soothe distress? Between the second course and the dessert, she had got rid of forty tickets. "She only wished she could dispose of two hundred: not from vanity, thank heaven; that was a feeling which she had never known; but from pity to the unfortunate orphans, who she loved to call her children,—her family."

"Dear Emily!" said the banker, "it is so rich a pleasure to her to succour the wretched. It is her only joy!"

"Ah! you flatter me," quoth Lady Emily. "I do it for your pleasure; for you are happy only when you are doing good!"

At this pathetic moment, a servant entered, and announced to Fitz Harding that some one wished to speak to him.

"At this hour!" said the banker angrily. "You know well, John, that I see no one while I am engaged at table."

The servant drew nearer to his master, and whispered, "It is Mr. Hopkins."

At that name Fitz Harding rose, begged his guests to excuse him, and passed into his study.

A little man dressed in black, there awaited the banker. Beneath his arm he carried a huge bundle of papers.

"Excuse me if I disturb you," said Mr. Hopkins, "but I thought that only come at this hour, or early in the morning, which would disturb you still more; and as you will not admit of any intermediary in the little matter which you have intrusted to me"—

"To the point, to the point, Mr. Hopkins!"

"Would you believe, Mr. Fitz Harding, that I left my office this morning at seven o'clock, and that I have not yet dined? I have made fifteen minutes to-day."

"To the point, I beg of you. I am engaged. Have you at length brought me some money? Shall I obtain my rights from these insolvent debtors?"

"I fear not sir, at least unless you proceed to extremities—the sale of their goods, or capture of their bodies. But your sensibility"—

"You know very well, sir, that there is no such thing in matters of business. Besides, I have not the patience to your agency but because I had to deal with dishonest persons, who are able to pay."

"They say not."

"So you have got nothing! Nothing from Mrs. Higgins the mulliner! She has owed me eighteen pounds for this year past."

"Nothing."

"What is the state of the affair!"

"We have got judgment and execution; the sale is for Wednesday, but I wished to see you before issuing bills."

"The sale must proceed.'

"She asks three months' forbearance. She is wholly without resources, and will be compelled to abandon her business. Her husband, who held a small situation in the bank, is dead of cholera; and she is left destitute, with three young children."

"Oh! she says her husband is dead of cholera! I can ascertain that, through my wife, who is a member of the committee of orphans. In the mean time, issue the bills at any rate."

"Very well, sir."

"And that young man, M'Farlane—he who reads memoirs to the Mechanics' Institute—has he yet untied his purse strings!"

"Alas! sir, the purse must be but poorly furnished, if I may judge by his goods."

"Nevertheless, he must pay the forty pounds."

"Forty pounds! My good sir, the debt is now sixty-five pounds thirteen shillings, including interest and cost. The poor young man will never be able to pay."

"He must, however. I don't understand being trifled with thus. Besides, Mr. M'Farlane has a place."

"He had one; a situation of eighty pounds a year in the custom-house."

"What! he has it no longer!"

"You ordered me to attach his salary, and he has consequently been deprived of his office."

"So I have no longer any security!" cried the banker. "Mr. Hopkins, you will proceed in this matter with the utmost rigor. I know that M'Farlane has resources. He has talents."

"Unproductive talents."

"I cannot help that. They who have unproductive talents should not incur debts. Mr. Hopkins, you will proceed."

"Everything has been done; there remains nothing but the seizure."

"That you will make then."

"To-morrow at five."

"No! To sell."

"His furniture is not worth more than ten pounds."

"Mr. Hopkins, I have duties to fulfill. In this matter I act not for myself alone. M'Farlane is indebted to the heirs of my father-in-law. It is affected no other than my wife I would wait—you know me sufficiently to be convinced of that. But this debt interests equally my brother-in-law, the Earl of Richdale, and my sister-in-law, the wife of General Huntingdon. You will proceed."

"As you desire, sir."

"You know well, Mr. Hopkins," added the banker, as he let out the officer, "that I am not a merciless man. I have waited long for these debts; but there is an end to all things. Besides, I tell you in confidence, that I have promised the Duke some whose collection I have entrusted to you, to my wife, who wishes to contribute them to the benevolent institution of our county, for she is a lady, and an Honorable, Mr. Hopkins."

At this instant the noise of the dance reached them, and the melodious orchestra of Willis flung its joyous harmonies into the banker's study. Fitz Harding hastily regained his rich saloons.

It was a delicious fête—an intoxicating route—a true millionaire's ball. The leaders of finance, the lords of diplomacy, all the world of fashion, were met together in this brilliant assemblage. A thousand lamps shed their dazzling light on women sparkling with the ornaments of dress and loveliness. The crowded masses of the happy and the powerful moved, to the sound of harmonious music, through chambers embellished with all the appliances of luxury, and all the wonders of art. At two o'clock a magnificent repast varied the pleasure of the night, and astonished, by its tasteful magnificence, guests accustomed to the prodigal splendor of ministerial tables. The day had dimmed the brilliancy of the lamps, while yet the dance continued,—while a magic and seducing galopade swept in its whirling course that gilded and undulating crowd, and offered to the charmed eyes a moving circle of women, of diamonds, and of flowers. I forgot to mention that at the close of the supper, Lady Emily Fitz Harding had already disposed of her two hundred tickets for the charitable ball.

Let us leave this scene of happiness and of pleasure, and transport ourselves to the fourth story of a dismal abode in one of the obscure streets adjoining Belgrave Square. After a night of watching and labor, a young man, seated before a small deal table, covered with papers, books, and mathematical instruments, near a fireplace, in which a few miserable embers yet glowed, had yielded to fatigue, and fallen asleep, with his head thrown upon his breast. An almost expiring lamp cast a dim light upon the pallid and melancholy face of the student. An open door presented to view within another chamber, a wretched bed, on which lay an elderly lady, whose thin and wrung features spoke of sickness and pain. The poverty of the humble dwelling was slightly disguised by its exceedingly neatness. A few old articles of furniture, the broken relics of former independence, saddened the eye by their ruined elegance. A dog, extended at his master's feet, had just awakened at the first ray of the sun, and looked up at the sleeping youth with an earnest and protecting look. Suddenly the door-bell rang; the dog sprang hastily up and uttered a low bark, which he at once stifled as he looked towards the bed of the old woman. "Silence, Blucher," said the young man, waking up and rubbing his eyes. "Surely there was a ring at my door;—who comes so early!" and he hastened to open it.

It was Mr. Hopkins—the man in black, with the bundle of papers, and the gentle manner and mien. But Mr. Hopkins, this time, was not alone. He was accompanied by two other men, in one of whom M'Farlane recognized the porter of a neighboring house.

"I beg pardon, sir," said Hopkins, bowing. "You do not recognize me, though I have already had the honor of speaking to you several times. I come for payment of the forty pounds (exclusive of costs) which you owe to the Richdale estate."

M'Farlane started.

"And unless the sum is paid this morning, I shall be under the painful necessity, according to my orders from Mr. Fitz Harding, to proceed to execution."

M'Farlane felt his heart cease to beat. He thought of his aged mother, who was sick before him, and now sleep quietly on the bed which they were about to sell. His step staggered, and the cold sweat stood on his brow.

Before proceeding, and during the time that Hopkins makes the inventory, let us explain the origin of this debt, and inform the reader how the poor youth became indebted to the heirs of the Earl of Richdale, for forty pounds.

In the Earl of Richdale, the father of Lady Emily, scientific acquirements of the first order, enhanced the lustre of titles and wealth. In free works, he was one of the distinguished men of his day, the most, and the most deservedly honored.

An important work published by M'Farlane, and some remarkable memoirs read by him to the Mechanics' Institute, had attracted towards this youth the attention of the distinguished old man. The acquaintance, sought by the card, had ripened into intimacy.

In a short time, as actual benefit conferred, brought to Fitz Harding's eyes as he spoke of the families of the indigent, who he had been instrumental in the benevolence of the rich. As for Lady Emily, she was sublime. "Of what value was opulence but to soothe distress?" Between the second course and the dessert, she had got rid of forty tickets. "She only wished she could dispose of two hundred: not from vanity, thank heaven; that was a feeling which she had never known; but from pity to the unfortunate orphans, who she loved to call her children,—her family."

"Dear Emily!" said the banker, "it is so rich a pleasure to her to succour the wretched. It is her only joy!"

"Ah! you flatter me," quoth Lady Emily. "I do it for your pleasure; for you are happy only when you are doing good!"

At this pathetic moment, a servant entered, and announced to Fitz Harding that some one wished to speak to him.

"At this hour!" said the banker angrily. "You know well, John, that I see no one while I am engaged at table."

The servant drew nearer to his master, and whispered, "It is Mr. Hopkins."

At that name Fitz Harding rose, begged his guests to excuse him, and passed into his study.

A little man dressed in black, there awaited the banker. Beneath his arm he carried a huge bundle of papers.

"Excuse me if I disturb you," said Mr. Hopkins, "but I thought that only come at this hour, or early in the morning, which would disturb you still more; and as you will not admit of any intermediary in the little matter which you have intrusted to me"—

"To the point, to the point, Mr. Hopkins!"

"Would you believe, Mr. Fitz Harding, that I left my office this morning at seven o'clock, and that I have not yet dined? I have made fifteen minutes to-day."

"To the point, I beg of you. I am engaged. Have you at length brought me some money? Shall I obtain my rights from these insolvent debtors?"

"I fear not sir, at least unless you proceed to extremities—the sale of their goods, or capture of their bodies. But your sensibility"—

"You know very well, sir, that there is no such thing in matters of business. Besides, I have not the patience to your agency but because I had to deal with dishonest persons, who are able to pay."

"They say not."

"So you have got nothing! Nothing from Mrs. Higgins the mulliner! She has owed me eighteen pounds for this year past."

"Nothing."

"What is the state of the affair!"

"We have got judgment and execution; the sale is for Wednesday, but I wished to see you before issuing bills."

"The sale must proceed.'

Earl of Richdale, who counsel not to honor him with his confidence and friendship. But the poor young man could not pay the money, and dared not again speak of the debt to his benefactor.

At the end of these three years, the earl died suddenly, leaving an immense fortune to his son and his two daughters, the eldest of whom had recently married the banker, Fitz Harding, and the youngest, the General Huntingdon. Unhappily, amongst the thousands that he left to his heirs, was found the obligation for forty pounds sterling, signed by the poor mathematician.

We left Mr. Hopkins making his inventory

in threats and rage. Every word came distinctly to my ear; it was Abraham P——, who was bumping upon his sister the weight of his anger.

He said to her: "Miserable woman, do you know that this house, into which you have brought the divine vengeance, was witness to the virtues of our father and mother, whose name you are unworthy to bear? Do you know, wretched girl, that here they died, exhibiting till their last sigh, grief for having given birth to such a depraved creature as you? At the moment of your death, they were still ready to have pardoned you, if only, repented sinner, you had returned to them with tears of penitence. But no, no; you knew they were about to die; and you did not abandon your shameful life to come to them and ask their forgiveness! They might have expired at your door, and at that very moment you would have refused to leave your infamous pleasures to help them! Why have you come here? Why have you come to bring disgrace and ruin into the house of those who were your parents, and upon the head of this young girl, your own daughter, whom I vainly wished to snatch from infamy. Oh! there is an avenger in heaven! Go, listen—listen only to the voice of the avenger! How he seems to shake the roof of the cottage, because I have received you under it!"

To these frightful words a silence of a minute or two succeeded, during which the wind, as if to accompany the wicked threats of her angry brother, shook the walls of the old house. All at once a piercing, agonizing cry drowned the tempest, and chilled me with horror. I rushed into the chamber whence the cry issued.

Never, never shall I forget that scene which exceeded all that imagination could conceive. Ah! truth has horrors unknown to the writers of romance! A dim lamp lighted the chamber. A woman, with arms extended, her eyes fixed and wild, her body half erect, seemed ready to jump out of the bed. Young Henrietta lay prostrate, her head upon the ground, and grasped with both hands one of the bed-posts. Abraham P——, who was standing, had retreated a few steps, at my sudden entrance into the chamber. He was ashamed of himself, disturbed at my presence, alarmed at what he had done and at what might happen. For he was not a bad man; but the scandalous acts of this sister had overed his mind; the consequences was frequent violent outpouts, and at that moment, driven to extremities by the presence of this sister, and by the recollection of her ill conduct towards their parents, he had uttered the harsh words I heard on my arrival. It is well known that domestic quarrels produce deep and durable hatreds among our peasantry, who think all the world of their family affairs and incidents.

Abraham P——, was alone conscious of my presence; the young girl seemed lifeless; and the sick woman, in the excess of her grief and terror, occasioned by the frightful threats of her brother, could see nothing, hear nothing, though her eyes were open, and she seemed even intently gazing upon some horrible scene which could only be seen by the eye of the mind.

I approached without speaking. My form, my movements, nothing attracted the attention of the sick person. She kept the posture, the same motionless attitude, as if she had been suddenly struck by lightning! I kept behind her, in order to prevent her falling, when the nervous fit should be over. The deep silence which succeeded, the expectation of an approaching and dreadful change chilled my frame even more than the north wind on the hill. But soon the consciousness of my situation, and the thought of my duties returned me. I reflected that I had to fulfil the ministry of peace and reconciliation for the unhappy people. God gave me strength and courage to perform my duty.

Gradually the nerves of the sick woman relaxed, a convulsive trembling seized her; she fell almost lifeless into my arms. Abraham P——, had hid his face in his hands, believing that his sister's hot moments had come; remorse doubtless stung his bosom; he felt that he had killed her! I thought too that she had expired. No sign of breathing appeared in the sick woman; her eyes were shut, nor her countenance was of a livid pallor. "Is not this death?"

No, thanks to God, the wretched woman still lived. I held one of her hands in mine, and I felt, after a few moments, a faint pulse. I leaned near her ear, and I cried to her in a low but distinct voice, these words of the Lord: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. The son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost (Matthew xi. 28—Luke xix. 10)." At these words, young Henrietta raised herself, and took me by the hand with a supplicating gesture; I showed her in silence that she had gone nothing to do but pray. The sick person, who had doubtless heard my words, slowly lifted her eye-lids, closed them, then opened her eyes again, and gradually her consciousness expressed returning reason.

——Doctor, she whispered (for she thought I was the physician), heal me; oh, I beseech you, heal me!

——I am not the doctor, I replied mildly; I am a minister of Him who doth not wish the death of a sinner, but his conversion and life.

——No, no, she cried with fervent earnestness, I must be healed; I am too great a sinner; I wish my life to be prolonged that I may atone for my past sins. Oh! I conjure you, she continued in a heart-rending tone, you do know something that will cure me, don't you? Henrietta, my child, go, look in my clothes; is there not a little money to buy the medicine? Cursed money! I am cursed!

I was going to speak, but with new force, reaching out her hands with difficulty, she exclaimed: Heal me, heal me, doctor; I cannot understand any thing at present; try do as I will listen to the pastor; I will do all that he tells me, I promise you; but now, a remedy, oh! a remedy!

She fell back upon her pillow, and uttered deep groans; it seemed that she felt at this moment that her cries were in vain, and that death was near.

I was moved with pity for this unhappy woman, and I desired with all my heart to impart peace to her soul. I availed myself of this lucid interval to speak to the sick person, in as strong and encouraging terms as possible, of the uselessness of such wishes as she expressed to be healed. I tried to make her understand that she must seek immediately and ask of God a new spirit, a new life, a new hope. The Lord designed to bless me at this solemn hour, and to put into my mouth words full of power and love. I unfolded to the dying woman the secrets of the life to come, the assurance of God's forgiveness in Christ for the penitent soul. I related to her the history of Mary Magdalene, and the victory of the Saviour over death and sin. I prayed with her. My heart was filled with compassion; I felt that the Father of mercies was with me, and the holy religion of Christ crucified appeared to me in a totally new view; it was like the rising sun which scatters the darkness before his face.

While I spoke, the sick woman, long motionless, made an effort, but in vain, to support herself upon her elbow. She leaned, then raised her eyes to heaven. From time to time she repeated in a low voice, as if speaking to herself: "Is it possible! my God, is it possible! Oh! if those who plunged me into ruin knew this! if they understood these things while there is time! But all at once, on seeking for mine, her eye caught that of her brother. There, it seemed that every salutary impression was effaced, distraction of mind, despair, even once again depicted on her face; she relapsed into delirium.

I felt as if my heart would break, and God inspired me with a good thought. I took Abraham P——, by the hand, and said to him: "Will you be less merciful than He from whom alone you can expect mercy?"

The poor man was overcome; he suffered himself to be led to his sister; he touched her hand, saying: "May God forgive thee as I forgive thee!" And he burst into tears.

I looked for the daughter, and led her to her mother. Henrietta embraced her shedding floods of tears, and said to her: "My mother, my mother, God will forgive thee."

Her brother's forgiveness, the words of the young girl produced the liveliest impression upon the sick person, and she seemed to understand them that God could yet pardon her. "It is then true!" she said reaching her hand to her brother, and casting a look full of tenderness upon her daughter; "it is then true!" and her face beamed with a heavenly expression. She was no longer a degraded and polluted woman; she was changed in a moment.

She did not speak again. Her eyes turned upward, were gradually quenched in death. The last struggle lasted about an hour, and when she expired, the same smile of joy and hope played still upon her livid lips.

When I left the cottage of Abraham P——, it was ten o'clock at night. The sky had become serene, innumerable stars twinkled in the firmament, and I gave thanks to God from the bottom of my heart.

News from Congress.

In the Senate, on Wednesday petitions from various quarters were presented for a protective tariff. Several private and local bills were passed, as well as a bill to extend the provisions of the act of May, 1828, to regulate processes in the courts of the United States, after which an Executive Session was held with closed doors.

In the House the bill for establishing the boundary line between Iowa and Missouri was taken up in the Committee of the Whole. There is a dispute as to the boundary turning principally upon the application of the name of Des Moines rapids. The State and Territory disagree as to which rapids of the river Des Moines are meant.

In the House, on Thursday Mr. Arnold made another unsuccessful attempt to introduce his bill to reduce the per diem and mileage allowance of members of Congress, to $6 per diem and the same rate of reduction per mile, and also for the reduction of other allowances to official persons. The Navy Appropriation Bill was then taken up.

In the Senate, the President pro tem., laid before the body a communication from the Treasury Department, relative to the Commerce of the United States. Mr. Calhoun presented four memorials from Florida, praying for her admission into the Union; also, on ultra Free Trade memorial from Middlesex county, Virginia, which gave rise to a long debate on the tariff.

In the Senate, on Friday, a large number of private and local bills were variously disposed of. Among them was passed one for the relief of the widow of the late Col. W. Thompson, U. S. A. and also the act to pay bounties for claims, for bounty, for property under military operations in Florida; Yeas 20, Nays 16.

In the House, Mr. Botts presented a petition from Alabama, requesting Congress to call on the acting President to resign. The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Naval Appropriation Bill, as returned from the Senate with amendments. Mr. Carter and Mr. King debated them till 12 o'clock arrived, the hour for ending the discussion. The Senate's amendment of $2,800,000 for $2,325,000 for pay was non-concurred in; 66 to 101. The next proposing to strike out the reducing process of the House, was also lost, having only 46 Ayes. The amendment of the Senate authorizing the appropriation of $100,000 for the construction of a floating dock at Brooklyn, New York, was passed; Yeas 80; Nays 56. The amendment, substituting $100,000 for $30,000 for the Pensacola Navy Yard was lost; Yeas 58, Nays 14. The Committee rose and reported, and the House proceeded to act on the amendments. Mr. Wise and Mr. Adams had a warm dispute.

On Saturday, the attention of the Senate was mostly devoted to a bill to reorganize the Post Office Department.

In the House the Resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary, that Corporations cease not under a Bankrupt Law was lost: 113 votes to 53. Mr. Barnard, from the Judiciary Committee read a report on a temporary revenue bill, which was ordered to be printed. The Army bill was taken up and debated. Mr. Gwin, of Mississippi, diverged to the Boundary Question and was called to order. He was especially noticed by Mr. Fitzsimmons, of Maine, for his conduct. Mr. Black, of Georgia, supported Mr. Gwin, and the debate was cut short by an adjournment.

In the Senate, on Monday a report from the Treasury Department was presented stating the public receipts for the former half this year at $18,967,513, and the expenditures for the same time $16,903,613. The bill regulating the Post Office law was taken up and discussed, but soon gave way to the Revenue Bill, which occupied the attention of members until near the hour of adjournment.

In the House.—The bill for the permanent employment of certain heretofore temporary clerks in the Post Office Department was with the Army Bill reported to the House, and passed. Mr. Arnold at length succeeded in introducing his bill for the reduction of the pay and mileage of members of Congress. Messrs. Hoge and J. G. Floyd objecting, the rules were suspended; yeas 98, nays 43. In the discussion which followed, Mr. Wise advocated an increase of pay, and Mr. W. C. Johnson introduced an amendment authorizing each member to draw for such a sum, not exceeding $8 per day, as he might think his services worth. Probably nothing will be done on the subject.

In the House, on Tuesday, after the presentation of some memorials in relation to the Tariff, the consideration of Mr. Arnold's bill was resumed. It proposes to reduce the pay and mileage of members; also to reduce the salaries of all officers of the federal government at the rate of 25 per cent.

The question pending was on the rejection of the bill; this was negatived, yeas 65, nays 124.

Mr. Arnold then moved the bill might be referred to a Select Committee, when a debate sprung up, and was continued for several hours by Messrs. Arnold, Jones, Brown, Shields, Fillmore and many others. On the main question the ayes and nays were ordered. The vote stood, ayes 69, noes, 79. So the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Marshall obtained the floor on the passage of the bill. When he had finished, the House adjourned without taking the question.

In the Senate, the Impost Bill came up as the special order at half o'clock, or soon after. Mr. Woodbury of N. H., took the floor in answer to the Senator from Maine who had yesterday made such an able defence of the Bill. Mr. Woodbury objected to the Bill in all its parts. He was opposed to the manner of raising Revenue pointed out in the provisions of the Bill, and the extent of Revenue which it proposed to raise.

He contended that the Bill called for millions more than were necessary—seven millions without the loads, and three millions with them. He would have whatever was taxed 60 cents brought down to 40, and so on through all its provisions. The Bill was called one of Revenue, but it was argued by the Senator from N. H., that the Bill was not one of Revenue, but one of manufactures.

Mr. W., was willing to go far no more than 20 or 25 per cent. in the way of taxation. Here he would stop, and of course upon the ground that in his opinion, this would be sufficient for the economical wants of the expenditures of the government. Mr. W., commented at length upon the general principles of economy and retrenchment, and upon other, generally and practically speaking, unmeaning topics of debate.

Mr. Evans replied, and was followed by Mr. Woodbury, when the Senate adjourned.

Pennsylvania Legislature.

On Wednesday, in the House, a message was received from the Governor informing that he had signed the supplement to the act abolishing Imprisonment for Debt.

Mr. Culver submitted a joint resolution authorizing the Governor to receive proposals for the sale of the Delaware divisions of the Pennsylvania Canal, and make report to the next Legislature. Laid on the table.

The House refused to concur in the amendments made by the Senate to the bill extending the charter of the Farmers' Bank of Reading, and the bill was returned to that body.

In the Senate, the whole of the day was spent in considering the Appropriation Bill from the House; and after a large number of amendments were offered, providing for the payment of the interest on the State debt, and for the general preservation of the integrity of the Commonwealth, all of which were voted down, the bill was transcribed for a third reading.

On Thursday, in the House, Mr. Scott made an attempt to repeal so much of the license law as requires applicants for tavern licenses in Philadelphia county to advertise in the newspapers; which was strongly opposed by Messrs. Morris, Beers, Karns, and others, and voted down; and in lieu of it, a section was added, repealing a similar exemption which had been extended to the counties of Bucks and Lancaster, by an act of April last.

At length the bill was postponed for the purpose of taking up the Appropriation Bill as returned from the Senate.

Several motions were made to amend the Senate amendments, all of which were disagreed to, and the question being taken on concurring in the Senate amendments, it was lost, yeas 26 nays 51, and a Committee of Conference, consisting of Messrs. Wright, Stevens, and Felton, was appointed. The Senate, being informed of the action of the House, appointed Messrs. Sullivan, Fenimore, and Cleavan, a similar Committee to confer with that appointed by the House.

So the Appropriation Bill is again in the hands of a Committee of Conference.

Senate.—The bill making the usual appropriations to meet the current expenses of Government, was defeated this morning on its final passage, by a the vote—16 to 16.

On Friday in the House, a number of private bills were disposed of; after which the House took up the bill providing for the trial of the City of Philadelphia (as a corporation) for violating the Trust committed to their care by the Will of the late Stephen Girard; and after a good deal of discussion, the same passed final reading. Yeas, 52, Nays, 25. The trial to take place in the county of Montgomery. The Senate will not pass the bill.

The Bill from the House to compel the Tidewater Canal Company to redeem their notes or receive them in payment of tolls, passed Committee of the Whole after some discussion.

The Governor has signed the Bill to incorporate the North Branch Canal Company.

On Saturday in the House, the bill from the Senate, repealing the act of March last, allowing the Bank of Pennsylvania to make an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, and requiring the said Bank to give the Commonwealth security for the time they have been on an assignment, under the General Law, was taken up, passed, and sent to the Governor.

Apportionment.—Mr. Felton from the Committee of Conference on the Apportionment Bill, made the report. A number of gentlemen spoke against the bill, and several motions were made to postpone it, or refer it back to the Committee. As a last resort the previous question was called, and sustained; and the Report of the Committee of Conference was adopted.

In the Senate the report of the same committee was adopted, without debate, and sent to the Governor for his signature.

The Appropriation Bill was then taken up on a motion to reconsider the vote, which being agreed to, the bill was so amended as to provide by means of taxation for the payment of the domestic creditors, for a more equalized system of taxation, and for the sale of the main line of our improvements from Philadelphia to Pittsburg. It was then lost, but soon after a motion was made to reconsider, and the bill was then agreed to by a vote of 17 to 13.

A message was received from the Governor returning the bill relating to the Bank of Pennsylvania, which passed the House this morning, with his objections. Agreeable to the Constitution, the yeas and nays were taken on the bill, and were 16 to 18. Lost.

The following is the bill setting off the State into twenty-four Congressional districts. It is probably as fair a one as could, under any circumstances, pass the present Legislature. The city and county of Philadelphia have justly been allowed four Representatives as at present. A new apportionment takes place every ten years.

1st District—Southwark, Moyamensing, Passyunk, Kensington, Blockley and West Philadelphia in the county of Philadelphia, and Cedar Ward in the city of Philadelphia.

2d—The city of Philadelphia, except Cedar, Upper Delaware and North Mulberry Wards.

3d—The Northern Liberties and Kensington in the county of Philadelphia, and Upper Delaware and North Mulberry Wards in the city of Philadelphia.

4th—Spring Garden, North and South Penn Township, Roxborough, Germantown, Bristol, Unincorporated Northern Liberties, Oxford, Lower Dublin, Byberry, and Moreland, in the county of Philadelphia.

5th—The counties of Chester and Delaware.

6th—The counties of Berks and Lehigh.

7th—The counties of Montgomery and Bucks.

8th—The county of Lancaster, except the township mentioned in the ninth district.

9th—The counties of Dauphin and Lebanon with the township of Rapho, Warwick, West Cocalico, and West Donegal in the county of Lancaster.

10th—The counties of Northampton, Monroe, Wayne and Pike.

11th—The counties of Schuylkill, Northumberland and Columbia.

12th—The counties of Luzerne, Wyoming and Susquehanna.

13th—The counties of Lycoming, Potter, Bradford and Tioga.

14th—the counties of York and Adams.

15th—The counties of Cumberland, Franklin, and Perry.

16th—The counties of Huntingdon, Juniata, Union and Mifflin.

17th—The counties of Bedford, Somerset, Cambria and Indiana.

18th—The counties of Fayette and Greene.

19th—The counties of Westmoreland and Armstrong.

20th—The counties of Clarion, Jefferson, Clearfield, Cole, Clinton, and M'Keen.

21st—The counties of Washington and Beaver.

22d—The county of Allegheny.

23d—The counties of Butler, Mercer and Venango.

24th—The counties of Erie, Crawford and Warren.

This bill, it is supposed, will give the Democrats 14 members of Congress, and the Whigs 9—leaving one district, the 23d rather doubtful.

On Monday the amendments made by the House to the bill annexing the county of Schuylkill to the Eastern District of the Supreme Court, were taken taken up and considered. These, together with amendments to other bills, occupied the whole of the morning session.

Upon the Senate meeting in the afternoon, Mr. Strohm, in a short and appropriate address, resigned the office of Speaker, and the Senate proceeded to elect a new presiding officer. Messrs. Gibbons and Speakman were the opposing candidates for the first six ballots, but afterward almost every eligible Senator was voted for. During the first ballots the vote stood, Speakman 16, Gibbons 15, scattering 2. Seventeen ballots were had, and the Senate adjourned without an election.

The Appropriation bill was the only subject of importance before the House.

On Tuesday the Senate proceeded to ballot again for Speaker, and no election was had until the thirty fifth ballot, when Wm. Hiester had 16 votes, John S. Gibbons 11, Jos. Crispin 2, and Rest. Fleming and James H. McLenahan each 1. Wm. Hiester was thereupon declared duly elected, and was conducted to the chair by Messrs. Fleming and Sullivan, whom he thanked the Senate in a few words for the unexpected honor conferred upon him. Mr. Ewing, of Washington administered the oath of office, and the Senate then went on in their usual routine of business. The greater part of the day was spent in the consideration of the Appropriation Bill, which was amended in the House, returned to the Senate where the amendments were rejected, and the bill was then put into the hands of a Committee of Conference, which in the evening session made report, which was referred back to the committee; soon after another report was adopted. The bill provides for the ordinary expenses of Government,—for the payment of the domestic creditors,—for the imposition of an additional tax and authorizes the Governor to receive it. A bill in relation to special bail occupied much of the time of the House during the day, and was finally passed and sent to the Senate, where it passed second reading; but the body refused to suspend the rule to read it a third time. Both branches adjourned a little after ten o'clock.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The gratifying intelligence was last Saturday communicated to the public that the long pending difficulties between the United States and Great Britain had been satisfactorily adjusted by the Executive and the English Envoy, with the consent of the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, Edward Kavanagh, Edward Kent, N. P. Preble, John Otis, Abbott Lawrence, John Mills, and Charles Allen. As is well known, the territory in dispute embraces all the region of the Upper St. John, and three millions with them. He would have whatever was taxed 60 cents brought down to 40, and so on through all its provisions. The Bill was called one of Revenue, but it was argued by the Senator from N. H., that the Bill was not one of Revenue, but one of manufactures.

Mr. W., was willing to go far no more than 20 or 25 per cent. in the way of taxation. Here he would stop, and of course upon the ground that in his opinion, this would be sufficient for the economical wants of the expenditures of the government. Mr. W., commented at length upon the general principles of economy and retrenchment, and upon other, generally and practically speaking, unmeaning topics of debate.

Mr. Evans replied, and was followed by Mr. Woodbury, when the Senate adjourned.

Foreign Intelligence.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMERS ACADIA, AND BRITISH QUEEN.

TWENTY-ONE DAYS LATER.

Great Britain, Another Attempt to Assassinate the Queen—India and China—France—Spain—Hungary—Portugal—The East—Miscellaneous.

The steamship Acadia arrived at Boston on the morning of Thursday the 21st, from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 5th, and the British Queen at New York, on Wednesday evening last, from Antwerp and Southampton, bringing London papers to the 9th inst. We present below a careful abstract of the most important movements and opinions.

Great Britain.

The British Parliament was occupied with a discussion on the appalling and increasing distress throughout the country. A series of resolutions had been offered to the effect that parliament should not be prorogued without an inquiry being instituted as to the extent of the distress and the best means calculated to afford relief. Mr. Bannerman had a motion on the books for empowering the crown to open the ports of Britain to a free importation of foreign corn, in case of necessity, before the re-assembling of parliament. The bill incorporating the tariff had passed its third reading in the House of Commons, and as it would probably not be delayed in its passage through the House of Lords, it would soon take its place among the statute laws of the land, along with the income tax act.

The convict Francis who fired at the Queen has been reprieved. There does exist a doubt that the pistol was loaded with a destructive substance. The announcement of his reprieve had scarcely been made known, when the public were alarmed by a report that another and exactly similar attempt had been made upon her Majesty's life. The details are almost too farcical to relate. It appears that as the royal cortege was returning on Sunday from the Chapel Royal, in St. James', to Buckingham Palace, a deformed youth presented and snapped an old rusty pistol at the carriage in which her Majesty was seated. He was seized by another youth who wrested the weapon from his hand, but the policemen in charge of the prisoner, fearing a rescue, believing it to be a hoax, on which he was permitted to escape. He was apprehended in the course of the day, when it was discovered that he had recently, and repeatedly been heard to say that he admired the conduct of Francis, and regretted that he had not succeeded in his attempt; that Francis was a brave fellow, and he wished he had been in Francis' place, for he would do for the Queen; that he had a prime air-gun and pistol, and he would use them in the same cause. The pistol had an old flint lock with a screw and rifle barrel. Upon detaching the barrel, which was done with some difficulty, from the screw having become exceedingly rusty, owing to its long disuse, there was found in a portion of very coarse powder, a piece of tobacco pipe, and some paper wadding.

Meetings of the shopkeepers of Manchester, Wolverhampton, Leicester, and other large towns, have been held to consider the prevailing distress. The Chartists and the Anti-Corn Law Association are also active.

The sales of cotton at Liverpool were small, the aspect of the market dull, and the prices at the close of June lower than at the commencement. The market was well supplied, but in a view of the stock being considerably less than it was last year at the same date, holders were rather firm.

The crops are represented as unusually abundant and early. Copious rains have relieved them from the effects of the late drought, and vegetation seems remarkably stimulated. The wheat harvest will be a fortnight earlier than it was last year. The markets have a downward tendency in consequence of the promising state of the crops, the easy rates of money, and the general stagnation of business.

The ratification of the long pending treaties between Great Britain and Texas were exchanged on Tuesday, the 28th June, by the Earl of Aberdeen, Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, and the honorable Ashbel Smith, Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Texas. These treaties are three in number—a treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce; a treaty undertaking mediation by Great Britain between the Republics of Mexico and Texas, and a treaty granting reciprocal right of search for the suppression of the African Slave Trade.

Considerable inconvenience has arisen among the trading community by the Government having issued their proclamation for cutting and defacing light gold, as the greater part of the sovereigns in circulation and all the half sovereigns have lost weight by friction. The operations of "sweating" and "Jewing" have been practiced upon to a great extent.

At the annual dinner of the member of the British Association, at Manchester, after the usual routine of toasts, the Chairman, Lord Francis Egerton, after some complimentary remarks, gave the health of the American Minister, to which Mr. Everett made a reply.

It was reported that Earl de Grey was dismissed from the office of Lord Secretary of Ireland, but it was afterwards reported that he was going to the Continent for his health, and that he would resume the government of Ireland on his return.

Her Majesty is said to be about to give her subjects great news and to bear a failure in the direct succession to the crown.

India and China.

The overland mail from India, arrived at Marseilles on the 29th of June, and dispatches reached London on the 3d, with dates from Bombay to May 29, Cabul, to April 28, Calcutta to May 13, Macao to April 4, and Canton to March 2. The mail was despatched ten days earlier than Bombay, to avoid the monsoon. The following telegraphic despatch reached London on the 1st: "General Pollock had joined Sir R. Sale at Jellalabad, re-establishing on his march the authority of Thomas Khan Sulipores. He was to march on Cabul as soon as he was joined by Col. Boulton. Gen. England has re-united his troops, forced the passes, and joined Gen. Nott at Cundahar. M'Kenzie had arrived at Jellalabad, with offers from Akbar Khan to release his prisoners on conditions. The answer was not know. Gen. Elphinstone died the 23d of April."

The accounts from China are interesting. On the 10th of March, the Chinese, 10,000 or 12,000 strong, intend to retake Ningpo, while another force attacked Chinghoo. In both instances they were repulsed with considerable loss.

The Chinese were allowed to enter Ningpo without opposition, but on reaching the market, they were fired upon and instantly routed, leaving 250 dead. The soldiers who were left dead, were all found to have a few dollars about them, supposed to have been a gratuity to induce them to the attack. The British suffered no loss at Ningpo or Chinghoo. A simultaneous attack had been intended upon Chusan, but it was defeated by the reconnoitering of the steamer Nemesis. Sir Henry Pottinger continued at Macao. Shah Shoujah had been murdered at Cabul by Zemaun Khan, brother of Dost Mohammed. Satisfactory intelligence had been received of the Cabul prisoners by Capt. M'Kenzie, who arrived at Jellalabad, April 25. He returned on the 27th. The answer given to the proposal for the surrender of the prisoners, for a very heavy ransom, was not known. The destruction of the garrison of Ghuznee is confirmed. Colonel Palmer left the citadel on the 26th of March, and took up his quarters in a portion of the town. There, so in the case of Cabul, the Ghuzees, apparently without orders, attacked the troops, and a frightful slaughter ensued. The leader of the insurgents, Shamshoodeen, interfered, and took the officers under his protection, and they are described as living as prisoners in the citadel. About 100 only of the sepoys are supposed to have escaped. Great confusion prevailed at Cabul after the death of the Shah, and it was doubtful who was in possession of the throne. Seven or eight officers, prisoners of the garrison of Ghizni, were at Cabul. It was believed that Gen. Pollock would proceed immediately to Cabul, Ghizni, and Candahar.

Spain.

The Paris papers are devoted almost exclusively to the elections. Telegraphic despatches continue to communicate success in the provinces adjoining Algiers. The last is dated June 25. A Royal ordinance has been issued, sanctioning certain changes introduced into the customs' tariff established in the French West Indies by the ordinance of the 5th of December, 1839. By this law several articles heretofore admitted into those colonies at a duty of five per cent. per 100 kilogrammes are prohibited; these are spices, which are abundantly produced in them. The duty on Teneriffe and Madeira wines is reduced from 100 francs per hectolitre to 60. The new ordinance also relieves merchants from the operation of the law of 1839, which decreed that foreign goods, proceeding from French entrepots, could not be imported for consumption into the French West Indies unless they had been naturalized by the payment in France, of the duties demanded by the general tariff.

Spain.

Advices from Madrid are to the 27th of June. Some insurrectionary movements at Figueiras (Catalonia) and Barcelona had been suppressed. The tribunal of Biscay had passed judgment on several individuals concerned in the insurrection of last October; twenty are sentenced to death, and twelve to the galleys; but it appears that they are all safe in foreign countries. Twenty-one other individuals were acquitted. A new ministry has been formed as follows:—Rodil, Minister of War and President of the Council; Almodovar, Foreign Affairs; Zumalacarregui, Justice; Ramon Calatrava, Finance; Cupar, Marine; Torres Solanet, Interior. The editor of the Correo Nacional had been sentenced, for libel, to imprisonment during four years, to a fortress, and to the privation of his office and decorations. The contractors for the first issue of the loan of 160,000,000 had acquired in the demand of the Minister of Finance, and consented to reduce the discount to 12 per cent. The army of the north has been dissolved. The troops of which it was composed are to pass under the command of the Captains General of the 18th division (Navarre) and the 11th (the Basque provinces.)

Hungary.

The Augsburg Gazette states that on the 9th of June disturbances of a serious character broke out in the city of Pesth, in Hungary, occasioned by the discontent of the journeyman tailors respecting some differences with the masters of the corporation in the matter of a saving's bank. Sixteen hundred of these men refused to work, and marched in a body out of the town. Some cavalry were sent against them, and forty were brought in as prisoners. Immediately an attempt at rescue was made by the journeymen and the populace. The town house, which contains the prisoners was attacked—its windows demolished, and the doors in the streets destroyed. The police were obliged to act, and many were wounded on both sides. The next day 3000 shoemakers had threatened to join the tailors, and much apprehension was entertained for the tranquillity of the town.

Portugal.

We have advices from Lisbon to the 27th of June. Neither the slave trade nor the commercial treaty were signed. The Duke of Palmella will immediately act in the Administration as Foreign Secretary and President of the Council, and Senhor Coupello will be replaced in the Marine Department by a statesman of more undisputed administrative capacity.

The East.

The times of the 5th instant give a counts from Beyrout to the 10th of June. Affairs were again threatening to assume a serious appearance in Syria, and an apprehension was entertained that a general rising would shortly take place in the mountain. On the 8th, Emir Abdalla, with his two sons, sought refuge on board an English frigate, sooner than subscribe to a declaration contrary to his conscience. On the 9th, the Seraskier Mustapha and Izzet Pasha waited in person on Col. Rose, to demand the surrender of the Emir. The Colonel having returned a formal refusal to this application, a warm discussion ensued, and the Pashas went so far as to say that they would carry him off by force. The colonel replied to them with a sneer, pointing at the frigate, "He is there, take him if you can." In the morning of the 10th, twelve Sheiks, all related to the family of Shahab, likewise retired on board the same frigate, having been informed that they would be treated in the course of the day. Several others who did not avail themselves of the caution were actually apprehended. The Turks had arranged a plot for seizing by a coup de main the Catholic patriarch of Lebanon.

Miscellaneous.

A discovery has been made lately in the northern part of Australia of a new river. The inhabitants were stated to be neither numerous or troublesome. The temperature varied from 62 to 82, and as this was in the mid-winter month of July, 40 feet above the level of the sea, it is easy to see that the summer heat would be oppressive to European constitutions. Nothing else, however, could be expected in the parallel of 18 degrees. The whole distance across that immense island or continent, from the Gulf of Carpentaria on the north, where the Albert disembogues itself, to Spencer's Gulf on the south, is about 900 miles, of which 300 miles have been explored northward from Adelaide by Mr. Eyere. The Albert admits of tracing nearly 100 miles in a direction to the south, so that there remains still about 500 to explore.

A Berlin letter states that the police ordinance, intendering smoking in the streets or public promenades in that capital, produced on the 8th ultimo a scene of great disorder. As the good people of Berlin are great smokers, many have been arrested and punished for violating the injunction, and on the day above mentioned some people who were smoking near the the Hamburg gate were also taken into custody. Upon this the populace assembled, and rescued them. A reinforcement of the guard was sent for, and these were assailed with stones and other missiles, which was continued until a stronger military force was called in.

Pierre Joseph Dumont, who acted as guide and interpreter to Marshall Bourmont in the expedition against Algiers, died in Paris, recently, in the 86th year of his age. Dumont had been a slave in Africa, during 34 years, when he was restored to liberty by Lord Exmouth in 1819. He was, at his own request, attached to Marshall Bourmont's army in 1830. Reduced in his old days to the greatest misery, he was obliged to have recourse to public charity, and terminated his long and agitated career in the hospital of Necker.

The Journal de Frankfort says that the Emperor of Russia, wishing to signalize the anniversary of the marriage of the Grand Duke Constantin, and heir to the empire, has granted commutation to 35 exiles, sentenced to hard labor for life in Siberia, but favorably spoken of by the Governor-General for good conduct, and various immunities to 85 condemned criminals, of whom 13 had already obtained permission to enter the army in Siberia. This is certainly an act of clemency.

Mr. Walker, the commander of the ship William Cunningyes, arrived at Bristol, from Cape Coast Castle, which he left on the 23d of March, reports that the Wilberforce, of the Niger Expedition, was there, on its way to Fernando Po, whence it was to proceed with the Soudan on a second expedition up the river. At accounts, on the 10th of March, most of the invalids had sufficiently recovered to be out house.

The Commercial Steam Navigation Company, whose boat was to the West Indies, by way of the United States, dissolved itself at its last meeting at the London Tavern. To relieve the company of its liabilities, the whole of the property is to be disposed of. It appears that the sum of $115,000 has been offered for their vessels, which left the sum of $70,000 to be raised.

As the Marquis of Waterford was driving out his bride, the horses of the phaeton ran away, and the lady suffered some contusions. The most lively interest was excited by the recent nuptials of the pair, the Marquis's kindness—(he had just forgiven his tenants a whole years rent)—and the engaging demeanor of the bride.

The Monitour Parisien mentions a report that the correspondence of Louis Napoleon, recently seized at Boulogne, comprises about 2000 letters written to, or respecting Prince Louis, by various persons, on the occasion of the two attempts which have conducted him first to America and next to Ham.

A gentleman employed by government has, it is said, in unroofing the river Juba, in Africa, fallen in with a considerable tract of country, inhabited by a curious race of pigmies, not exceeding four feet in height, with very curious views of religion and government, and exactly resembling the type of Herodotus.

Two new bishoprics are about to be formed by the committee appointed for that purpose, viz: one in New Brunswick, which, with a population of 156,000, will have an endowment of £1,200 per annum; and another in south Australia, with £1,000 per annum.

On the 12th ultimo, a fire broke forth at Bellingshausen, near Wurzburg, in Germany. The dryness of the season rendered it impossible to obtain water, and the inhabitants being in the fields, forty houses were consumed before the flames could be distinguished.

Cooke, the equestrian, has been again unfortunate. On Monday week, his circus, at Glasgow, was destroyed by fire; and though his steed were saved, a considerable portion of his valuable wardrobe was destroyed. He is partly covered by insurance.

SISMONDI.

Another of the great lights which rose in Europe during the last century, has just set. John Charles Leonard de Sismonde, one of the most celebrated historians and political economists of the age, died at his country seat near Geneva, on the twenty-fifth of June, aged sixty-nine years. Sismondi's family were originally of Pisa, but had been for some time settled in the South of France. His father, an old member of the Genevan Government, retired to England in consequence of the troubles in the Canton during the year 1792, and on his return, two years afterward, was sentenced, with his son, to a heavy fine and a year's imprisonment. On recovering his liberty, Sismondi the younger, went into Tuscany, where he was subjected to new persecutions. The French first threw him into prison as an aristocrat, and Geneva having in the meanwhile been annexed to France, the Italians confined him as a Frenchman. In the autumn of the year 1800, he returned to Geneva, and published his first work Tableau de l' Agriculture Toscane, which was followed in rapid succession by many important publications, particularly, in 1803, by a treatise in two octavo volumes, entitled, De la Richesse Commerciale. His studies were not confined to history, politics, and the sciences connected with them. He explored every department of elegant learning; his extensive knowledge of the literature of foreign countries, particularly of the criticism and poetry of Germany, had a tendency to elevate his views above the narrow conventional rules which then obtained in French authorities; and his Litterature du Midi de l' Europe—which in part was translated into English, and published in London, in two volumes—forms a new era in French literary history. His two greatest historical works are Histoire des Republiques Italiennes du Moyen Age, in sixteen octavo volumes, and the History of France, in twenty-four volumes. His other most important works are, New Principles of Political Economy, etc. in two volumes; Julia Severn, a historical romance, illustrating the condition of Gaul at the time of the conquest of Clovis, near the close of the fifth century; History of the Italian Republics, being a View of the Rise and Fall of Italian Freedom, in two volumes; and Des Esperances et des Besoins de l' Italie, published in 1832. He was a constant contributor to the Revue Encyclopedique until its adoption of the Saint Simonian principles, and he wrote most of the notices of important historical personages in the Biographie Universelle. In his political character he was an aristocratic republican. He was apparently opposed to the imperial government until Napoleon returned to France from Elba, when he gave to the world an enkomium on the French Constitution, and addressed to the French Nation a warm appeal in behalf of the Emperor. As a historian, he ranked among the first who have ever lived. His writings are distinguished for scrupulous exactness, are replete with instruction in regard to facts, and in their pictures of social changes. Such of his works as have been republished in this country, have been highly esteemed by all men of learning and judgment. For the last four or five years, the venerable author had lived in seclusion, near Geneva, universally respected, and prepared for his virtues, and by the world for his acquirements and genius.

OUR MINISTER TO ENGLAND.

The kindly feelings which pervade the English nation toward this country, were happily exhibited on the occasion of the late meeting of the British Association of Science, at Manchester, in the honors bestowed on our distinguished Minister, Mr. Edward Everett. This Society numbers among its members the principal scientific and literary men of the world, and we regard the cordial manifestation of good feeling toward America, indicated in its reception of Mr. Everett, as the highest compliment that could be paid. Lord Francis Egerton presided at the Society's dinner, and among the guests were Signor Paul Freiasni, of Milan; the Hon. and Very Rev. William Herbert; the Rev. Dr. Peacock; the Marquis Spadi, of Genoa; H. Hallam, F.R.S.; the Rev. Wm. Vernon Harcourt, F.R.S.; R. I. Murchison, F.R.S. Pres. G.S.; the Hon. Edward Everett, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States; the Marquis of Northampton, Pres. R.S. F.S.A.; Professor Jacobi, of Konigsberg, who wore the insignia of the Prussian order of Merit, and of the Russian order of the Red Eagle; the Bishop of Norwich; Sir William Hamilton, F.R.S. astronomer royal of Ireland; Rev. Professor Sedwick, F.R.S.; Sir David Brewster, K.C.H. LL.D. F.R.S.; M. Erman, of Berlin; Sir William Jardine, F.R.S.E.; Professor John Phillips, F.R.S.; His Excellency M. Reichel, of Petersburg; Professor Brancbman, of Moscow; Count Keyroling, of St. Petersburg; Baron de Buch, of Germany; Rev. Dr. Shepherd; Sir Charles Lemon, F.R.S.; Sir Henry T. de la Beche, F.R.S.; the Rev. Dr. Buckland; Dr. Richardson, F.R.S.; the Marquis Tarugioni; Professor Graham; Dr. Enge, Secretary Royal Society, &c. Lord Francis Edgerton, after the usual routine of toasts, remarked that among the distinguished foreigners present there was one whom, although he came from a far country, from another hemisphere, and as the representative of a foreign state, still he would not close as "a foreigner"—nor would he not any of his countrymen be so considered in England. They spoke a common language, they had a common origin, and the same Anglo-Saxon blood flowed in the veins of both. It was only necessary to go from the factory exhibitions of Manchester to the docks and docks of Liverpool, for any man to be convinced that no mission could be at once more honorable or more important than that of cultivating and cementing, if he may, friendly relations between two such countries as the United States of America and England, which was, he believed, the main part of the mission of the distinguished individual near him, to this country. The high reputation of his honorable friend had preceded him here; and he (the chairman) was sure that England would consider she could not have had a higher compliment paid to her by the United States, than in sending Mr. Everett as her representative. The health of his Excellency was then drunk by the company standing, and with marked enthusiasm. Mr. Everett on rising to reply, was received with great cheering. We extract from the report of what he said, as follows:

He said that he should be more or less than man if he did not feel considerable embarrassment at the manner in which the toast had been received. He was, however, relieved by the conviction that it was meant to reach far beyond himself—across the Atlantic—and that it was meant for the people whom he had the honor to represent. (Cheers.) He accepted all their kindness in the spirit of frankness in which it was given. Whilst he experienced such a welcome as the present, he felt indeed that he was not a stranger among them, but in crossing the wide ocean that separated his country from theirs, he had come into the land of his fathers to receive the kindness and the cordiality of the heads of their ancestors. (Cheers.) His excellency then adverted to the relations between colonies and mother countries—whether founded upon conquest or emigration. Egypt, Greece, and Rome, had each had colonies, but there never had been, and there never could be, such relations between them as now existed between the United States of America and this country. (Applause.) Those relations were to be found in the mysterious bond of a common language, a common origin, and a perfect conviction that they were destined to exercise an all-powerful influence on each other, and to fulfil the highest mission in the order of Providence for the welfare and happiness of both.

Mr. Everett then adverted to the origin, progress, and vast extent of the cotton trade, which, dating no further back than 1784, expanded so rapidly and to an vast extent as to have carried England through the wars and the conflicts attendant on the great French Revolution, and to have mainly sustained her enormous expenditures since. He added:

Republicans as they (the Americans) were, there was a much greater affinity between America and Great Britain, politically speaking, than between any of the European monarchies, or between any two nations on the face of the earth. (Cheers.) With the Americans as with the British, liberty was enshrined in the constitution; and if the pillars of their monarchy were laid deep in the minds and the affections of the people, by which they were bound together to support the throne, the foundations of American liberties rested upon trial by jury, habeas corpus, freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, and self government, tempered by submission to lawful authority. (Cheers.) His Excellency concluded by expressing the happiness he should feel in being instrumental in cementing the best understanding between England and the United States, and resumed his seat amid the cheers of the assembly.

In the same day, at a public meeting in Manchester, an address was adopted and afterwards presented to Mr. Everett on behalf of the "Merchants, Manufacturers," &c. of that city, in which they say they "gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of expressing the friendly sentiments they entertained towards the great country whose people and government" is represented by Mr. E.—speak of the strong ties of blood, language, interest, &c. which connect the countries—and remark that they are of the same branch of the human family as the people of that land "where man is pursuing with unfaltering steps all that is great and noble"—that "much of what is cheering in the future progress of the world may depend on the career of two nations so intimately allied, and that a heavy responsibility is imposed on each, in working out its part of the all wise designs of Providence, in the advancement of the highest common interests of our race"—and that the best friend of both countries is he who promotes enduring amity between them. The address then adverts to the condition of trade between the two countries—regrets that these exists any restrictions upon it—and expresses the conviction that "the doom of monopoly is sealed" in England, and that "one long, the abundant products" of the U. S. and "the various manufactures" of England, "will be freely interchanged;" that they are "most anxious that perpetual peace should exist between the two countries, founded on mutual respect and mutual benefits, and that wherever the flag of either may be unfurled, it may be hailed as the herald of amity, civilization, and religion. The address closes with wishes for the personal welfare of the Minister, and that his mission may promote that friendship between the two countries, which is the sentiment of "a vast majority" of the people of the Three Kingdoms. Mr. E. made a happy reply, in which he fully reciprocated all the good feeling of the address. He said:—

The relation between our two countries is indeed, sir, as you have described it, of a most intimate character; more so probably than has ever existed between two great states. I am gratified to believe that this relation has contributed, in no small degree, to the prosperity of both; and that such may continue to be the case, must be the desire of every patriotic citizen of either country. (Cheers.) On those topics of the address, which are matters of controversy, both in England and the United States, the delicacy of my official position precludes me from any comment. Our two governments (led by similar considerations in reference to the state of their finances) are now engaged in revising the laws of trade. I shall cordially rejoice in the utmost possible extension of commercial intercourse, which the wisdom and experience of the two governments shall deem compatible with the welfare of their constituents. (Loud cheers.) In your wishes for the perpetuation of peace between England and the United States, I most heartily concur. Its interruption I should deem most disastrous to both; I will add, to the whole civilized world. (Renewed cheers.) Nothing that I can do, consistently with my duty to my country, shall be spared to avert such a catastrophe, of which, I am happy to say, I have no apprehension. It is my ardent desire that our two kindred countries may run a long and glorious career of mutual and emulous exertion to promote the arts of civilized life.

OBSERVATORIES.

One of the professors of Harvard College, we understand, has been several days in this city, examining the instruments and building of the High School observatory, preparatory to the erection of a new building on a small eminence, about three quarters of a mile west of Cambridge. At this time, the instruments of our observatory, as well as the tower and dome erected for their use, are the only models of the kind which approach to the character of those in Europe; and many teachers and artisans from various parts of the country have been led to the city to examine them. Hitherto the limited means for prosecuting astronomical science in the United States have been discreditable to the government and people. The only observatories we have heard of were a small establishment owned by Professor Hopkins, of Williams College, Massachusetts; one owned by Joseph Bonaparte, at Bordentown, New Jersey; a third attached to the Western Reserve College, in Ohio; and a fourth at Tuscaloosa, in Alabama. Now, beside the above, and our own, there is a small one at New Haven; eight thousand dollars have been subscribed for the establishment of one at Cincinnati; the National Institution at Washington, are taking means preparatory to erection of one at the Capital; funds are in readiness to purchase instruments and erect a tower in Cambridge, and the faculty of Yale College are preparing to establish one at New Haven. The American Philosophical Society has likewise in its treasury about five thousand dollars to be devoted to the promotion of astronomical science. These proceedings constitute a very good beginning.

In Europe, it is ascertained, there are not less than one hundred and twenty observatories, the largest and most expensive of which was founded two hundred years ago by the Emperor of Russia, near St. Petersburg, in a region where it is comparatively valorious, as it is so near the pole that it offers to the inspection of the eye but a limited portion of the northern hemisphere, and the atmosphere is so chilled that an observation of the heavenly bodies is impracticable during ten months of the year. Mehemet Ali, too, had in course of erection a similar establishment for magnetic and meteorological observations, to be completed at his own cost; while our more "enlightened" Christian neighbors, the Turks, have "imitated" Egyptian in his efforts for the promotion of philosophical inquiry, expend annually three times the amount necessary for the erection of an Observatory that would answer all useful purposes, in the purchase of valuless baubles for the adornment of the Capitol.

If observatories were of slight or questionable worth, the apathy evinced in regard to them by our Government might be deserving of no censure; if they were monuments of national vanity, contributing nothing to the general wealth, the ostentatious monarchies of Europe would be their more appropriate theatre; but so far from being so, they are in the highest degree practical, and more necessary to this country, than, with the single exception of England, perhaps, to any other in the world. We have vast interests involved in Commerce, and this of itself constitutes a sufficient reason for erecting them in every principal port along our coasts. The expense attending the establishment of an observatory is generally overrated. Large telescopes are in some cases necessary, the art of dividing having been carried so far that small instruments are insufficient; but a building can be furnished for three thousand dollars that will answer all ordinary purposes. The duty of establishing observatories is clearly within the province of the Government. Those in other countries have uniformly owed their existence to public appropriations. In the British Islands, there are observatories at the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford; at Edinburgh and Glasgow, in Scotland; and at Dublin and Armagh, in Ireland; all receiving some patronage from the crown; in addition to which, there has been erected, under the same patronage, an observatory at the Cape of Good Hope, already celebrated for the labors of Sir John Herschell. There are beside some half dozen establishments upon various remote and widely separated dependencies of the British empire, including Van Diemen's Land, for the immediate building and furnishing of which, arrangements have been lately made by the Government. We hope to see the United States a little in advance of Timbuctoo and Kamschatka in the same field.

FIRST NATIONAL AUTHORS.

Some writer who has recently given an account of the first authors of the different nations, seems to have forgotten that we Americans had a pioneer in letters, in the person of "a renowned poet of New England, Benjamin Thompson, learned schoolmaster and physician," of Dorchester, Plymouth colony. He flourished about one hundred years ago, and is considered the first native writer of much reputation. We mention below some of the earliest authors of other nations. The Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, in Hebrew, is the oldest book extant, written about 1500 before Christ, or over 3,300 years ago. The oldest Greek books, and author, are the Iliad and Odyssey, of Homer, written about 900 B. C. The earliest Latin works extant, are the Comedies of M. Accius Plautus, written 200 B. C. The earliest British author is Gildas, who wrote a Conquest of Britain. A. D. 500. The first French writer was Venan Fortunatus, who wrote a book of Latin Poetry, A. D. 560. The earliest Arabian, Persian or Turkish work of any note, is the Koran of Mohammed, written A. D. 600. The earliest German work is the book of Poems and Theology, of Walafrid Strabo A. D. 841. The first Russian work was the compilation of a Code of Laws, by Yaroslaf, in the year A. D. 1000. The first Spanish writer was Aizan, on law, before 980, A. D. The earliest Portuguese author is Moura, who wrote songs, &c., A. D. 1100. The earliest Italian author is Ancarano, a writer on Jurisprudence, 1182—1260. The first Swedish author is Eric Olai, who wrote in 1400, a History of the Goths and Swedes. The first Polish writer is Vincz Kadlobek, who wrote in 1226 a history of Poland.

THE CROTON WATER-WORKS.

The New York Courier says that the entire cost of the Croton Aqueduct—the greatest of the kind in any country in any age of the world—is estimated at Four-teen Millions of Dollars, including the cost of the distribution through the city in Iron Pipes. This large sum bears an interest averaging about six and a half per cent., making the annual interest upon the whole investment, Nine Hundred and Ten Thousand Dollars. Add to this repairs, superintendence, &c. &c., and $950,000 per annum is the least possible sum that it will cost the city. The proprietors of the Astor House are about to have pipes for Croton water put into every room in their immense establishment. The cost of putting them up will be very great. As to the water itself, it will cost them about five hundred dollars a year, which may seem a very large sum, but when it is considered that they already pay about three hundred and seventy-five dollars for water, and that a considerable saving in labor will be effected, the new arrangement will be seen to be cheaper than the present plan.

Literary Intelligence, &c.

The copyright question is attracting much attention in England. We learn from a number of the London Chronicle, received by the Acadia, that a public meeting of authors and publishers was held early in July, at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of adopting measures to prevent the increasing evil of foreign piracy of British literary works. It was fully attended, and among the gentlemen who took part in the proceedings, were Lord William Lennox, Sir Charles Morgan, James, the novelist, J. S. Buckingham, Spottiswoode, Bentley, Colburn, Grant, Dickinson, Browne, Chorley, Ashburner, Simpson, and many others. The chairman, the well-known publisher, Mr. Longman, opened the business by simply stating the object of the meeting. Mr. James, in a very able and lucid speech, exposed the great injustice which literary piracy by foreigners inflicted on British authors and publishers. He instanced cases wherein works which cost them £1 11s. 6d., were sold in America for 1s. 2d., and wherein several thousand copies were published abroad, while only one thousand were put in circulation there. He concluded by moving a resolution asserting that a right in property in literary productions ought to be recognized by all civilized nations, which was seconded by Lord William Lennox. The other gentlemen mentioned above moved resolutions condemnatory of foreign literary piracy, as detrimental to authors, publishers, and readers. It was ultimately resolved that the resolutions adopted should be forwarded to the proper departments of the Government, in order to induce Her Majesty's Government to give the subject their immediate attention, and to adopt means for bringing about such treaties with foreign powers as would enforce a mutual recognition of literary property.

☞ Mr. Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America" is very favorably noticed in some of the London periodicals. Albany Fonblanque's "Examiner," the highest critical authority in England, confesses surprise at the great number of our bards, and the amount of good verse which they have produced.

"Any very great novelty, we are bound to say," remarks the Examiner, "must not be expected in them by the best natured. This is a point given up, in an honest manful way, by even Mr. Griswold himself. But on the whole there is prettier writing than an unprepared reader would look for. It is quite surprising—the number of graceful and earnest utterances in the manner of Wordsworth, and Mrs. Hemans, and Miss Landon—that seem from these samples to be constantly going on among our transatlantic brethren."

Longfellow is singled out for especial admiration; his Psalm of Life, What the Heart of the Young Man said to the Psalmist, and the Village Blacksmith, are quoted, and the article concludes with the following paragraph:

"We must not forget to thank Mr. Griswold, before we close his volume, for the good taste and good feeling of his preface. It would be difficult to overpraise either. While he urges his countrymen to worthier and more original efforts—he discriminates the true service of legitimate attempts they have hitherto made to achieve a literature distinctively their own. Mr. Griswold is an earnest and intelligent advocate for an "honest and polite system of Recognition, of Right." We like very well—and the saying is worth more attention from more governments than his own, than is commonly given to it—that Literature not less than Wealth adds to a nation's happiness and prosperity. Men of letters should receive quite as much of the care and assistance of the government, as is extended to the agriculturist or the manufacturer."

☞ The letters of Corinne, we believe, were wholly or in part translated by the lamented Robert C. Sands, but never published. We learn from Langley's last Literary Advertiser, that a translation of the Letters and Despatches of the Conquestador to the Emperor Charles V. has been made by Mr. George Folsom, of New York, and is now in press in that city. The first of these Letters or Despatches was written by Cortes soon after landing in Mexico, and published at Seville, in 1522. The others appeared at subsequent dates. They contain a full account of the events of the conquest, and are written in a style of great simplicity and elegance. Cortes constantly speaks in the first person, unlike Cæsar, who, in his commentaries used the third; and the details not only of occurrences, but of the motives that actuated the conquerer, and the reasons assigned for his various movements, are given by him in an official manner. The letters first appeared in the Gazette of Venice, in 1524, and they have all been translated into various other European languages at different periods. English historians have consulted them, especially Robertson, who refers to a Latin translation of 1532. Humboldt, in his great work on Mexico, constantly cites the original, following the edition of Archbishop Lorenzana, published at the city of Mexico, in 1774. This is the edition which Mr. Folsom has used in making his version. They have never yet been published in the English language.

☞ The foreign reviews and magazines for July, are less interesting than usual, yet they contain some articles that will command attention. The new number of the Foreign Quarterly, has an article entitled "The American Envoy and the King of the French," in which Mr. Fanny Kemble Butler gives in Bentley's Miscellany, a lively sketch of a journey from Philadelphia to Georgia, which is by no means flattering to the people she saw on the route, or fare provided at the taverns. The same magazine publishes Longfellow's fine poem "Excelsior," as an original contribution to its pages! Blackwood, for the month, is learned and rather dull. Among its articles are one on Cicero, one on India and Afghanistan, one on the condition of Greece, etc. The Metropolitan has recently become very poor, and the last number, like many preceding ones, is made up of miscellaneous articles of different novels. The Dublin University is now next to merit to the "leading magazine of the world," the Blackwood. The July issue contains a continuation of "Charles O'Malley"—the same chapters which, received in advance of the publication in Europe, we gave last week—a fine story entitled "Carl Stelling, the Painter of Dresden," by Dr. Laver, and many other pleasant articles.

☞ Among the new societies founded in London in one under the patronage and presidency of Lord Francis Egerton, called the "Eliric Society," for the illustration of Anglo-Saxon and early English history and philology. Its object is the publication of those Anglo-Saxon and other literary monuments, both civil and ecclesiastical, tending to illustrate the early state of England, which have either not yet been given to the world, or of which a more correct and convenient edition may be deemed desirable. The works are to be published in uniform octavo volumes, containing the Anglo-Saxon originals and a translation. It is proposed to commence the series with "The Homilies of the Anglo-Saxons," of which a considerable portion are ascribed to the learned prelate by whose name the society is distinguished; to be followed by "The Lives of the Anglo-Saxon Saints," "The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," the works of King Alfred, viz: his versions of Beda's Ecclesiastical History, of Gregorius de Cura Pastoral, and of Orosius; together with such other early remains as the society may deem worthy of publication.

☞ Lynde M. Walter, late editor of the Boston Transcript, died on Sunday evening last, at the age of 43, after a confinement of two years. For twelve years he was editor of the Boston Transcript, and always distinguished himself as a man of judgment, ability, courtesy, and marked gentlemanly deportment, who never, knowingly, injured a human being. His literary taste was good, his reading extensive, and with the modern press but very few could have had a more correct and intimate acquaintance.

☞ There have been found lately in the Sierra Elvira, in Spain, more than two hundred Roman tombs, and an aqueduct. Several skeletons bore the rings of Roman knights, and some of them had in the mouth the piece of money destined to pay the ferryman Charon. These skeletons crumbled into dust as soon as they were touched. With them were found gold and silver bracelets, amber and crystal necklaces, ornaments of various kinds and pieces of armour.

☞ La Petite Chouannerie, is the title of a new work of some interest just published in London. It is the account of a spirited college insurrection in Brittany, against the Emperor during the Hundred Days. The author, A. F. Rio, is spoken of as a sincere and accomplished man. His work contains several fine poetical contributions, relating to his subject, from Wordsworth, Mrs. Norton, Landor, and Monkton Milnes.

☞ The commencement of the New York University took place on Wednesday of last week. The degree of A. B. was conferred upon 21 young gentlemen; that of A. M. on about twenty. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred on Rev. W. Adams, Rev. R. Dickinson, and Rev. J. McDonald, of Scotland, all of the Presbyterian Church; and the degree of L.L.D. upon Chief Justice Taney.

☞ A new tragedy, entitled "Edwin the Fair," from the pen of Henry Taylor, Esq., author of the remarkable poem, "Philip Van Artevelde," has just been published in London by Murray.

☞ Sir Edward L. Bulwer has recently completed a new drama, which Mr. Macready has accepted, and it will be one of the earliest novelties at Drury Lane next season.

☞ The Rev. G. W. Bethune, D. D., will deliver the annual address before the Andover Theological Institution, at the approachment commencement.

☞ William B. Reed, Esq., will deliver the annual address before the Phi Beta Kappa, of Harvard University next month.

Abel Parsons, or the Brother's Revenge, is the title of a new American novel just published by J. Winchester, New York, and for sale by G. B. Zieber, Philadelphia: price twelve-and-a-half cents. The scenes are laid in the city of New York, and the characters, drawn from real life, cannot fail to attract attention. The time of the narrative is in the autumn and winter of the year 1835, when the Great Fire took place, by which a large portion of the business part of the city was reduced to ashes. We are acquainted with few passages in novels more vivid or more impressive than the description of the Conflagration, in the concluding chapters of "Abel Parsons."

☞ It is related that Galileo, who invented the telescope, with which he observed the satellites of Jupiter, invited a man who was opposed to him, to look through it, that he might observe Jupiter's moons. The man positively refused—saying, "If I should see them, how could I maintain my opinions which I have advanced against your philosophy?" This is the case with many. They will not look at the truth—they will not hear it, for fear that the arguments which they have framed, will be destroyed, and they may be obliged to give up their vicious indulgences.

☞ Captain Wilkes, of the Exploring Expedition, is stated, has brought home, among other valuable things —2000 charts, 1000 maps, 11,000 specimens of plants, 4000 specimens of fishes, 50,000 specimens of shells, 2000 landscapes, 2800 specimens of reptiles, 4000 specimens of marine plants, 1500 drawings of South Sea Islanders, 26 large boxes of journals, &c.

☞ Mr. Dickens arrived at Liverpool June 29, having made the passage in twenty days.

Notices of New Works.

An Essay concerning the unlawfulness of a Man's Marriage with his Sister by Affinity: with a Review of the various acts of the highest judicatory of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, touching this and similar connections: By Colin McIver, V.D.M. One vol. 18mo. Philadelphia, H. Hooker, 176 Chestnut street.—After examining this book with considerable attention—induced by the representation of a friend that it embraced the most ingenious arguments that have been urged against a man's marrying the sister of his deceased wife—we lay it down with astonishment at the puerility of its logic and the impotence of its conclusions—not doubting now, whatever we have thought before, that the Scriptures contain no sentence or word or letter having the slightest direct or indirect allusion to the subject. In this opinion we are well pleased to observe the leading journals of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopal, and other Churches, coincide. We have not space nor time for an elaborate review of Mr. McIver's book, nor is a secular gazette so fitting a place for one as a theological review; but as the book charges vast numbers of respectable persons in every portion of the country with the grave crime of incest, and as it seems to us to be rather too contemptible a production to attract regard from the higher organs of religious and literary criticism, our readers will not be displeased if we say a few words on the general question. In the brief limits of a newspaper paragraph, we can present no more forcible illustration or argument against the assumption that the Scriptures contain the doctrine advocated by Mr. McIver, than an incident related in that admirable paper, the "New York Observer." A pious gentleman who contemplated marrying the deceased wife's sister, but who felt some doubts as to the propriety of doing so in accordance with the rule of "The Confession of Faith," took the Bible, and turned to the 18th and 20th chapters of Leviticus, expecting to find it written in so many words, "Thou shalt not marry thy deceased wife's sister," or something equally explicit. He read carefully both chapters, and finally searched through the whole book without finding a solitary passage that even suggested to his mind the rule in question. In this state of utter uncertainty, he applied to a very distinguished Old School Presbyterian clergyman for his opinion on the subject; and the clergyman immediately replied that the rule was founded on the Levitical Law, and took the Bible apparently expecting to turn to it in a moment. But after having carefully read through all the laws on the subject, and paused upon several of them, that it might not escape his attention, he did not find it any more than his friend had done, and remarked as he shut up the Bible, that he thought it must be founded chiefly in expediency. Shortly after his friend ascertained by some means that the supposed authority of the rule existed in Lev. xviii. 16, and was actually quoting himself of the text which had been suggested by his own experience, he determined to subject the Scriptural authority of the rule to this very fair and simple test. He went to about twenty of the oldest men whom he knew, who had been ignorant either of the existence of the rule, or of the authority on which it rested. Among these were several distinguished clergymen, and some half dozen of the first judicial characters in this country. In some instances he referred them to the two entire chapters in which the rule is supposed to be contained, and asked them to find it; but not one could succeed, or even hit on it so far as to guess at the verses which it claims for its authority. In every case he referred them to the identical verses which it is alleged contain the rule, and though some of them paused and gave the subject a good deal of reflection, and carefully examined the passages in their connection, there was not one among them who did succeeded in making out the rule; and but one who even came so near it as to say that he could not conceive of their reaching it in any way unless by some inference. On these facts he issued the following argument. "No law," said he, "can exist under a wise and equitable administration which is not intelligible to the persons to whom it is intended to bind. But here is a law given by God himself; a Being of infinite wisdom and goodness, and designed to be obligatory upon all mankind; a law, too, prohibiting a crime for which the civil law sends a man to the State's prison, which yet is so obscurely revealed, if revealed at all, that not only common Christians, who read their Bibles daily, never find it, but ministers, the business of whose life it is to study and expound the Bible, and the men of piety who occupy the highest judicial stations, and are professionally expounders of the law, do not find it out even when they search the Levitical law for it most diligently; no, nor when the verses which are supposed to contain it are proposed to them."

Now while we may suppose that an unimportant point of doctrine may have been so obscurely revealed that some doubts can reasonably be entertained respecting it, it is utterly preposterous to imagine that a great law—especially one opposed to the common sense of mankind—should be so indistinctly shadowed forth that the wisest doctors of divinity should find difficulty in determining on what passages to rely for its support—in deciding even where it is alluded to! Out upon such absurdity! It is personally disgraceful to the most illiterate priest or layman in the world who maintains in speech or page the puerile conceit. We have mentioned our reasons for not discussing all the positions of Mr. McIver. We now say farewell to his broken essay—the most heavy volume of its size our ill fortune has ever led us to encounter.

Before leaving the subject we have a few words to say to interested parties. It seems to us that under ordinary circumstances it were best for man or woman to be content with one marriage. It looks not well for a man to steal flowers from the grave of one to whom he has professedly wedded his heart for ever, to weave in gay bouquets for another's brow—to dance at a second wedding between the top of a first bride is entirely faded. Still, there are cases in which a second marriage is a duty. If a man finds himself alone with a family of small children, the necessity for such a course will generally be sufficiently apparent; and when he determines to wed again, every principle of religion, justice, common sense, point to the sisters of his deceased wife, if any there be, as the persons from whom he is to select his companion in his remaining years, and the guardian, friend and instructor of his children. The heart-burnings, and dissensions which offer step-mothers occasion, need not then be dreaded. There are many considerations connected with this point of the controversy, which, having occupied so much of the reader's attention already, we regret that we cannot present.

The Boston Miscellany.—The August number of this Magazine contains several admirable articles, the best of which is on the Old English Dramatists, by James R. Lowell. Evart A. Duyckinck, Alexander H. Everett, and W. A. Jones, are among the other contributors. It is embellished by a finely engraved view of the great monument which has just been completed on Bunker Hill, and medallion heads of eight distinguished Americans. The fashion plate is wretchedly engraved and colored, and like every thing of the kind, is eminently discreditable to a literary magazine. Why not put in the tailor's report of fashions for coats and pantaloons, for the season, as well as the cut of the gown and the profusion of the bustle? (Drew & Scammell, and W. Burgess, Philadelphia publishers.)

The Ladies' Companion—August, 1842. New York, W. W. Snowden.—The last number of this monthly contains two steel engravings and a fashion plate, and contributions from Willis, Ingraham, Mrs. Osne, and other popular writers. Some old songs by General Morris, having been printed in all the penny papers, years ago, seem rather out of place in an "original" magazine. The "Companion" is edited with taste and ability, and deservedly enjoys a large share of public favor. Mr. Burgess, No. 2, Ledger Building, is the Philadelphia publisher.

Graham's Ladies' and Gentlemen's Magazine—August, 1842.—Embellishments: "The Bud and the Blossom," engraved on steel, and "The Watchers," a beautiful mezzotint.—The two hundredth number of this unrivalled work has been issued several days, and is generally spoken of by the journals, as the best that has ever appeared. The proprietor, encouraged by its vast circulation, has secured the services of the most eminent writers of this country and England, including Bryant, Cooper, Longfellow, Hoffman, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, Sargent, the author of "Henri Quatre," and others, and seems determined to spare no cost in obtaining literary articles and embellishments of the first order. The leading papers have every where denounced the absurdities called "Fashion plates" with deserved severity, and we are pleased to perceive that they are no longer a feature of the Magazine. Their place will be supplied with other embellishments of the finest description. The story entitled "Da Ponte," commenced in the present number, promises to be one of thrilling interest; the comic novelette by Epes Sargent, called "Tousky Wousky," is equal to any magazine article of the kind we have ever read; Bryant's poem, "The Maiden's Sorrow," is in the happiest style of that great poet; Mrs. Embury's story, "Error," has a melancholy interest, and will be universally popular; and the articles by the Hon. S. G. Goodrich, H. W. Herbert, "The author of Cruising in the last War," C. F. Hoffman, Mrs. Smith, J. T. S. Sullivan, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, Park Benjamin, Theodore S. Fay, Robert Morris, and others, are all excellent. The new feature introduced by Mr. Griswold, under the head of "Editor's Table," promises to add much to the interest of the work. The Letter from Niagara, in this department, is admirable. The editorial review of Bryant seems to us to be just and discriminating. Indeed the critical part of the Magazine seems never to have been more judiciously conducted. Graham's Magazine will now unquestionably take the position in this country which Blackwood's occupies in Great Britain. (G. R. Graham, No. 98 Chestnut street.)

Godey's Lady's Book.—We miss the names of some of Mr. Godey's best contributors from the cover of his August number; but suppose they will reappear on that for September. The new issue is tastefully embellished with two steel engravings, and among its articles are some of much merit from Mrs. Hale, Mr. McMichael, Miss Leslie, and others. We have quoted on another page of this paper a specimen from the pen of Mr. Tuckerman, with which the reader will be pleased. Our neighbor advises his subscribers of the great success which continues to attend his exertions. He richly deserves all he receives.

☞ The New York Plebeian publishes a decision by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts involving the liabilities of bail. The plaintiffs arrested one Martin Draper, on civil process, and the defendant became his bail. The defence was "that Draper having been sent to the State Prison, the defendants were by that means discharged from their liability." The Court decided that the defence was good. The counsel for the defence in the above cause cited English authorities to show that a person in England being made a Peer, is in law dead for all purposes. Thus, in England being made a Peer, and in this country being sent to the State Prison, discharge the bail.

Latest Fashions.

With the warm weather come new bareges have appeared, termed bareges Bayadieres. They are equally light and pretty, of very soft texture, sprigged with flowers or covered with Arabic patterns; next to glace silks they are the most fashionable wear in demand. The white seems to be quite confined this season to evening dress. Embroidered muslins, Indiana muslins, organdyes, lace pointed muslins and jaconets are no longer visible in daylight. The most fashionable material in a thousand different styles are the only article in demand. Walking dresses are generally made high, to wear with the transparent mantelet or pelerine; the skirts are of prodigious width, and the length so inconvenient as during wonder. Short sleeves are fashionable for the hour; in long ones, those a la Diane de Poitiers and the Amadis are much worn. The pointed corsages are almost exclusively reserved for dress toilettes; the rounded form is worn en negligee, and the ceinture with long ends. Dinner dresses are of foulards, satins, printresses, perkins, poi de soie, &c.

A novelty in trimmings is a new style in flounce made quite plain at the top, but falling in flutes at the edge, they form elegant trimmings without loading the dress; they are very pretty in striped pekins; very full and narrow ruches chenilles are much in favor for ball-dresses and peignoirs. Scarfs of embroidered muslin are trimmed with Valenciennes lace, headed by a houlonne, through which a riband is passed, corresponding with the color of the dress, and terminated by a full ruche made of the same material, with bouillons, with arm holes, and forming very large round at the back. The round pelerines continue to be much worn. Camaïls of that silk are also trimmed with ruches; one exquisite camaïl of light green gilly. There is at present little to say about bonnets; fancy straws and a new kind of paille de rix, which cleans well, are the principal novelties. Crape flounces and tulle houllonne are very elegant and suitable for dinner parties. Capotes a coulisses are always fashionable; they are frequently entirely covered with tulle, which gives them a very light appearance. Capotes composed of folds of crape should always be of the color of the dress. Coutonne Josephine or Ceres, bunches of lilies of the valley, are used for capotes of gauze; double poppies, daisies, cornflions, alsea, wild roses, for Leghorns.—London and Paris Journal of Fashion.

A Hard Case.—It is extremely hard when people who after suffering years of anguish and pain and rapidly gaining health and cheerfulness by the use of Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills, to have the cup of joy dashed rudely from their lips by those unprincipled men who sell the unsuspecting invalid a counterfeit article for the genuine.

The public are respectfully informed that all genuine medicine has the title expressed in full on the sides of the boxes, thus: Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills, (Indian Purgative) of the North American College of Health —and that the label which covers the boxes, has around the border, in small type, the following:—"Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1840, by William Wright, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania."

Purchasers should be extremely careful of whom they buy the above Pills, as there is often great danger in using a counterfeit medicine, especially when manufactured by an unskilful and irresponsible person—while on the contrary, great benefit is sure to be derived from the use of the genuine Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills.

PENCHANTS.

When come and Peri steps to meate,
About the moonlight and the dews,
The fairies and the fleets,
He's apt to think, he's apt to swear,
That Cupid lives not any where
Except in grottoes and bowers:
They some have vulnerable livers,
But hands who hamed the banks of rivers;
That none are fair enough for witches,
But maids who roam through dells and doches;
That dreams are (wise as street as dreams;
That cities never breed romances;
That Beauty always keeps a cottage,
And Innocence grows pure on pottage.

Yes! these dear dreams are all divine;
And those dear dreams have all been mine.
I like the dewning of the day,
I like the smell of new-mown hay,
I like the babbling of the brooks,
I like the cawling of the crooks,
I like the lowing of the heifers,
I like the whispers of the zephyrs,
I like the ponchos, and the posses,—
But chiefly when the flowers classes.
And often, in the month of flos,—
When every cockney closes his gut,
And pawkers tell enormous lies,
And clerks are pretty sure to rise,
And scullions wear their reddest face,
And cocoons my their clarinet grace,
And o'er the chancellor, they say,
Goes to a point the nearest way,—
I wander from my drowsy desk
To revel in the picturesque;
To lane beneath the honey trees
The fair effulgence of the seas,
Or trace you river's many channels,
With Petrarch—and a brace of spaniels.
Combining foolish rhymes together,
And killing sorrow, and shoe-leather.
Then if I see some village maid
Go dancing down the sunny glade,
Coquetting with her fond admirer,
As nobler dames have done before her,
"Give me," I cry, "the quiet bliss
Of cools like these, of scenes like this,
Where dancers eat and sleep in peace,
Where gallants never heard of Greaves,
Where day is day, and night is night,
Where frocks and breeks both are white
Blue eyes below, blue skies above,
Here are the homes, the hearts for love!"

But this is idle;—I have been
A sojourner in many a scene,
And pick'd up wisdom in my way,
And cared not what I had to pay,
Smiling and weeping all the while,
As other people weep and smile;
And I have learn'd that Love is not Confined to my hour or spot;
He darks the emile, and fans the frown,
Alike in desert and in town.
I think fair faces not more fair
At Pockles, than in Portman Square,
And glazes not a ray more bright
In mesalliances than in candlelight
I think much witchcraft oft repose
On wrattle of artificial roses,
And ringlets—I have ne'er disdain'd them
Because the barber has profaned them
I've been half mad with half a million
Where hope have never crown'd a pillion,
Where hands have never dowed a mind,
Where lips have never sung a ballad;
I think that many a modern dance
Breeds passion quite as much as romance;
And many a concert has its springs
For breaking hearts as well as strings
In short I'm very sure that all
Who seek or sigh for beauty's thrall,
May say their prayers and find their pasture,
Though what and where and whizzing keep in fashion,
And make the most enchanting sonnets,
In spite of diamonds and French bonnets.

MY FIRST DUEL.

BY MORDECAI MANASSEH NOAH.

FROM "THE UNDOW."

I called a day or two ago to see my old friend Colonel Webb, who I learnt had arrived at his residence in Wavely Place, from his late excursion to the Brandywine. He looked well, quite well—his whiskers were as large and fierce as ever, with here and there a few grey and mercury white hairs, and his spirits if any thing were more buoyant and elastic, as he had accomplished a certain specific and desirable object by the issue of the recent duel. Over the elbow of his capacious arm chair repused a pair of significant crutches. I thought of Sir John Falstaff—

"There's honor for you."

We talked over the adventure in detail, with congratulations that it was not worse in its results, as it certainly might have been, if the apostle of temperance and the Colonel had both been the crack shots they were said to be in the classical galleries. Dwelling at the present time, has fallen into disrepute; it never did settle any point of honor, and sensible men discard it as incompatible with the spirit of the age; yet peculiar circumstances, as in the case of Webb and Marshall, drive men to such hostile meetings, and it would be fortunate to all parties concerned, if the issue was equally favorable. It is much more agreeable to shake a man firmly by the hand, than attend his funeral; and as to posthumous praises of courage, coolness, gallantry, &c. in such affairs, what are they worth? who heard of such honors? as Shakspeare says,

"He that dies last Wednesday."

It is said, that the apostle of temperance is not satisfied with the result of the duel; he thinks that Webb ought to have been killed, and he is desirous of having another duel at him. If Mr. Marshall is so fond of fighting, he can place himself at the head of the Affghanistans in the Cabool country, or serve as aid to Ching Ling Chowsen of Pekin, and he will have fighting enough for the apostle of any moderate man; but Col. Webb ought to be permitted hereafter to eat his woodcock and toast in peace; though wounded he enjoys the best position of the two, and he should not part with it to popularize it by another meeting. As Horace would say he has all the honors, but has lost the cold trick. Talking of duelling, I have always been satified that it is moral, and not physical courage which is the active agent in such affairs, and sustains a man in such trying positions, and this was made manifest and strongly impressed upon my mind by my first duel. When a very young man, at Lord's party table, I found myself talking the head of the Democratic ranks in Charleston, South Carolina. Impressed with the belief that a difference of political opinion, though warmly expressed and firmly carried out, did not necessarily impair that good personal feeling, and intercourse which should exist between citizens and citizens, I was in hopes to make converts and put down opposents, in the most pacific manner; but I soon discovered my error, and was given distinctly to understand, that he who ventures to bring about important political revolutions in that section of the Union, must be prepared to fight his way in the world; he who is ambitious to become a political leader, must exhibit something more substantial than mere oratory.

He who would influence and control a party, must sustain his doctrines by meeting his opponents in the very first problems settle such differences, he must undertand and be understood. This I presumed, was what is called Southern chivalry; it was all new and most extraordinary to me, who came from a pacific quarter of the Union, and felt no disposition at all to carry my political phase and objects into operation at the mouth of the pistol. But so it was. Being in Rome, I had to do what Romans did. So having offended a young spring of Federalism, by venturing respectfully to differ with him in relation to the war with England at a private dinner meeting, he gave me notice that he should call me out. I felt no apprehension on the subject, convinced that explanations could readily be made, which would and he had to grant entirely satisfactory with reasonable men. So I proceeded to the City Library, and while enjoying a very agreeable book in a cool and sequestered part of the ample saloon, a handsome young gentleman of engaging appearance and address came up to me, and after two or three formal, yet graceful bows, placed in my hand a neatly folded note, written on vellum paper. The note introduced me to Major Hamilton, since Gen. Hamilton and Governor of the State, by the gentleman who I had most unfortunately offended, by differing with him at the public meeting, and informed me at the same time, that Major Hamilton would make the necessary arrangements for the meeting, &c. On reading the note I arose and made several profound bows to the gentleman, finding that this was a business of very serious importance. We took out seats near each other, and I wrote another, of war, palmetto forts, rice birds, cotton crops, and several agreeable subjects, for I was very happy to make his acquaintance, until the Major in the most polite manner, reminded me of the important object of his mission, and the necessity of a reply to the note he had just delivered. Novice as I was in such matters, I was still aware that etiquette required a prompt reply, and I assured him, that he should receive a note from me on early hour. I forthwith called the leaders of our party together, to consult and determine what was to be done in the premises. They were unanimously of opinion that I must fight; there was no avoiding the responsibility; the honor of the democratic party required that I should fight; it was the usage of the country, and no leader of a party of such high and patriotic pretensions, could evade an invitation in which the dignity of the party was so vitally concerned. As this was, therefore, a bona fide point of honor, upon the result of which it was impossible to foresee what might be the decisions of our country, it was resolved that I should give his note meeting, and a high public functionary of great courage and discretion, was fixed upon as my second; and I conveyed the note in the most polite manner imaginable accompanied the invitation, and leaving the preliminaries to be settled by the plenipotentiaries and high contracting parties. Early in the afternoon a carriage drove to the door, containing two of my particular friends, with a request to have a ride. Supposing it was intended to talk over matters, and arrange for contingencies, the weather being exceedingly pleasant, I sprang in, and away we went as fast as two spanking grays could carry us. As soon as the door of the carriage a case of pistols lay very comfortably, and my friends informed me that we were going out of town to fire at a mark, supposing that I was rather out of practice, which was really the fact, never having, to my recollection, fired a pistol in the course of my life. We alighted in the centre of a field, and a card was pinned to a tree, and the pistols loaded, and placed in my hand at a distance of ten paces. Nothing daunted, I took my point cautiously and firmly and hit the card. "Brave—captain—try again," said my friends; and I were on firing and hitting the mark, with all imaginable coolness, and even slight contempt. "You are a first rate shot," said one. "Fire dead, he will be killed," said the other, "there is no escape for him." "No standing mark shots," "Fire," said I to my friends, "what kind of a person is this man who I am to meet?" "A captain, officer, of great promise, a gentleman of fortune and character, of a large and eminent family, highly educated and respected."

"And I am to kill him," said I to myself! Good heavens! a man who never occasioned me, and to whom of course I participated no ill will; "but the honor of my party was implicated, and he must die." I could not reconcile myself to the morality or the philosophy of this issue, but I was in the hands of my party, and of right honorable men as friends, and it was my duty I supposed to submit. The city was alive with the projected duel—we were both the lions of the day. I had not the honor of knowing my brother lion, yet I was to kill the next day; I was quite sure that I had no ill will towards him, and if the honor of our respective parties had not been a question at issue, I felt confident that we both could have adjusted the difficulty over a bottle of much side Madeira, in the most pacific manner imaginable. The Police, with a strict eye to their duty, took special care to inform all the sporting characters that the affair was to come off at the race course at four o'clock, and all the gigs in town were engaged to witness the exhibition. The ladies sighed, and thought it a pity for two such nice young fellows to run the risk of killing each other, but finally they entered into the spirit of the contest, and both of us had a chance of resembling the dying Gladiators for the amusement of the audience in the Coliseum. Just at the very nick of time, when the period of negotiation had been nearly exhausted, my friend E. S. Thomas, then Editor of the City Gazette, believing that no good political results were to grow out of this duel, at a moment of great political excitement, and when the country at war with a great power, required union, concert in action, and friendly feelings among citizens, called early in the morning, on Keating Lewis Simmons, Esquire, then at the head of the Federal party, and submitted various considerations why this hostile meeting was uncalled for, and the political as well as personal consequences which might grow out of it; and it was finally arranged to call the high contracting powers together in Council, and ascertain what could be done in the premises. After a meeting, and a deliberation of four hours, it was finally agreed that there should be no meeting—that mutual explanations should be made, and the affair was honorably arranged, according to the most approved principles of duelling, and the most popular requirements of etiquette. I was entirely satisfied with the issue, having no desire to kill my antagonist, who, by the way, was a very worthy person, by the name of Tenner, since dead; nor had I any wish to be killed my myself; but the dear public, it seems, was not so well satisfied with the result—there was to be no fight after all. Pompey had harnessed the bays in the Buggy—whips, spurs, and trotting horses were all ready for the race course, to see two promising young fellows shoot each other, and as the affair is settled—the pistols are returned to the case—and the Doctor was not called upon to prepare lint, probe stick, and plaster. This humane disappointment, however, was coupled with strong suspicions pretty loudly expressed, that I, like all reputing democrats, would rather cut than fight. This unworthy insinuation, which aroused my indignation, did not allay the political fever, and in a few days afterwards I got into a newspaper controversy with a gentleman, I believe, by the name of Crafts, and I received another little billet duet to meet him at the Race Course. To use a familiar phrase of a knight of the Race Course and Thimble Rig, I really did not know how to bend off this invitation, when my antagonist fell sick, and the affair, like the other, was honorably adjusted. Let it be distinctly understood, gentle reader, that in these challenges to bloody conflicts, there was really in truth and in fact not the least cause or ground for a hostile meeting. It was the fashion of that day to adjust all such disputes at the mouth of the pistol. Public opinion since that time, the newspaper—the distrust and suspicion of your countrymen. The practice, were it not for folly, rashness and hot blood in Congress, would fall into general disrepute as it should fall a monument of folly and false honor.

SONG.

BY ROBERT GILFILLAN.

My own, my true-loved Marion!
No wreath for thee I'll bring;
Nor summer-gathered roses fair,
Nor snow-drops of the spring!
Oh! these would quickly fade—for soon
The brightest flowers depart;
A wreath more lasting I will give—
A garland of the heart!

My own, my true-loved Marion!
Thy morn of life was gay,
Like to a stream that gently flows
Along its lovely way!
And now, when in thy pride of noon,
I mark thee, blooming fair;
Be peace and joy still o'er thy path,
And sunshine ever there!

My own, my gentle Marion!
Though 'tis a world of woe,
There's many a golden net that falls
To gild the road we go!
And in this chequered vale, to me
A light hath round me shone,
Since thou cam'st from the highland home
In days long past and gone!

My own, my true-loved Marion!
Cold, cold this heart shall be,
When I shall cease to love the cliff—
To chase and cherish thee!
Like ivy round the withered oak
Though all things else decay,
My love for thee shall still be green,
And will out fade away!

THE CHILD AND THE POET.

BY ROBERT MORRIS, ESQ.

FROM THE PENNSYLVANIA INQUIRER AND COURIER.

"THERE IS A DROP OF HONEY IN EVERY FLOWER."

We once heard a little child, in rambling through a garden, turn an inquiring eye upon its mother, and ask—"is there not a drop of honey in every flower, mamma?" This question, though so childish and simple, was not without poetic beauty, and the mother paused, yet pleased, hesitated and replied—"yes, my child; although 'tis possible that from some, the bee has not yet discovered the mode of extracting the sweet." Byron somewhere remarks that "man is one all evil," that lingering round the heart is some affection or some virtue, even in the most vicious, which will make its appearance, if the proper touchstone be applied. This is doubtless true with the millions, especially in civilized life and Christian society. There are few flowers from which honey may not be extracted, there are few human souls which do not contend some germ of feeling, pearl of benevolence, or impulse of manly virtue. With some, the touchstone is love; with others, adversity; with some, a scene of great peril; with others, the heyday of prosperity. The humblest are sometimes the possessors of the noblest virtues. The weakest vessels apparently, and woman's gentle nature, can withstand temptation longest, can undergo suffering with the greatest degree of patience, can manifest in the most eminent degree self-denial, and will persist more readily life and all that is valuable in life, for the cherished object of love. We were struck a few or two ago, with a Card in one of the papers from the pen of Mrs. Emery, the wife of the convicted Lawyer of Boston. Some one had circulated a report that the wretched man had been joined in a purple for the mean, and generously; and that whatever might have been his faults and follies in other respects, as a husband and a father he had been true to his duties; that with his children would have been happy and cheerful in weal or woe, he might depend upon her undying affection. There spoke the true woman. There broke forth that devotedness which shines brightest in adversity, which perhaps only with life, is to be extinguished, which will fresher fire and holier light, in another and purer existence. The friend of prosperity is in too many cases, a mere pretender, the time-server and the hypocrite. Adversity is the true test. "It is sorrow," says Mrs. Jamieson, "which makes our experience. It is sorrow which teaches us to feel properly for ourselves and others. We must feel deeply before we can think rightly. It is sorrow in the tempest and storm of passion we can reflect, but afterward—when the waters have gone over the soul, and like the precious gems and rich merchandise which the wild wave casts on the shore out of the wreck it has made; such are the thoughts of retiring passions. Who that has lived long and been tossed with any degree of violence among the tempests of the world—who that has got out a little way from them, and calmly looks back upon, neglected and unknown, in one of its obscure retreats, has not tested the real nature of some of its fellow-creatures? Who has not seen the smile of the parasite in the hour of affluence, turn to misfortune and misery? while in some rare instances, benevolent hands have been stretched out as old friends abandoned, and gentle voices have whispered consolation, as friends we served in better days? Sometimes the most unlikely hands and looks that frame the soul. These gentle voices and benevolent hands are to man as drops of honey in the flower. They are the sometimes concealed, but not the less valuable sweets of human existence. They are the drops of benevolence gushing from the original fountains of the soul, and like glimpses of sunshine amidst the shadows and storms of human existence, their warmth and beauty are the more appreciated, because of the coldness and obscurity around them. They are to be found quite as frequently in humble life as in exalted; for in the former, the impulses of nature and the influence of God, are much more likely to linger than in the latter, because riches are too apt to harden the heart, and artificial forms and ceremonies to blight the early and benevolent impulses of the soul. The remark of the child was true, and we take true. "There is a drop of honey in every flower," and "none are all evil."

A SABBATH IN THE FOREST.

FROM THE NEW YORK OBSERVER.

The following spirited account of a Sabbath in the solitudes, is taken from the remarks of Rev. John Todd, at one of the late benevolent celebrations at Boston. In the northern part of the State of New York, he said, between the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain, and between the Mohawk and the Hudson, there is a wilderness 150 miles long and 100 miles wide. I had no conception there was such a wilderness this side of the Mississippi. This wilderness is filled with lofty mountains, little inferior to the White Mountains of New Hampshire. On the tops of these mountains clouds gather and pour down their rains, and scatter, their snows, so that large reservoirs are needed to hold the superabundant waters. The hand of God has hollowed out a number of beautiful lakes, in the bosom of these mountains, for this purpose; and here arise the rivers which flow in various directions to the sea. In the course of the journey, in company with a learned friend, I entered that wilderness, and penetrated to the centre, where is a beautiful lake of 20 or 30 miles in length, and several miles wide, interspersed with little islands. Here we found seven families, that lived alone. They had a little footpath through the wilderness, so that, whenever they wanted to step into a store, to buy any necessaries, they could do so by following this foot-path only. Imagine yourself, or, if a man wants bread for his family, he has only to take his grain on his back, and go the same distance and get it ground, and then bring it back in the same way. These people were keen at hunting and fishing, but children at every thing else. But death had entered even there, and taken a beautiful girl of seventeen, who had just died with no one to administer the consolations of religion, or to perform religious services over her funeral. It was Saturday night. The sun was an hour high. When it was all ready, I and some ministers of the gospel, two young ladies jumped into a little boat and rowed four or five miles, to tell the neighbors. The next morning was still. There was no hunting or fishing. The cows scattered unmolested after their prey. It was the first Sabbath that was ever kept there, and I was to preach. We met in a little hut covered with bark. All were there. We could not sing, for no one knew how to raise a tune. In the afternoon to accommodate a mother that had a young child, the meeting was appointed seven miles up the lake. We found them all there. The use of our boats was noised by the rather, and the other by the two sisters. One old hunter came down from forty miles farther up; and he was able to raise a tune—a half hunter's and half psalm tune. What a meeting was that!" There were only 33 souls. "Why they came round me and said if I would come and live with them, they would give me fish enough to eat, and stop hunting on the Sabbath. When we separated, as we got out a little way from them, there was a pause—they raised the tune and began to sing the hymn—

"People of the living God," &c.

Was I weak because I wept? These are the sheep which have strayed from our fold—the poor ones of the family, whom we are to send after.

SUMMER.

FROM THE ABBARANTH.

I do not know why—I suppose the feeling is an unnatural one—but I have ever felt in Summer tenfold more lonely than at any other period of the year. When the sky above you is unfailingly bright and blue, and the sun looks down cheerily on the green earth, and all is smiling, and yet beautiful around, does not the heart, sadder and anyone its own seeking it, feel deeply the influence of sadness and depression; and do not impetuous longings rise up within you for those who are absent, and who ought (for your enjoyment of the scene) to be with you now!

We realize, perhaps, in a dreamy vision things that were. We shadow forth those companions—from memory we call them itself—all that we once loved. We restore to our desolate bosom the friend that was once to us all in all; and for a season are we thus made perfectly happy.

The room in which we are sitting is perhaps the very same,—no one article of its furniture has been altered,—nay! there lie the very same books as of old, the same ornaments, the same arrangement of every thing. From the window is seen the same tranquil prospect.—

"The river wandering of its own sweet will."

The distant hills retiring each behind the other, until the treetops mingles into the soft blue sky. The shadows of the trees are cast upon the green sward in the distance and through asleep; like the pale on his mother's breast." And, look, while the sun gleams down upon it, and turns its glassy surface into

"A burnished sheet of living gold."

The glorious luminary shines likewise into the old quiet room, even as it did in other times. See! it streams in through the casement, and its refracted ray forms on the opposite wall the same gorgeous figures that we once remarked in company with our hallowed ones. The old picture-frames create the same shadows—shadows of the same intensity, the same size, the very same shape; and it is the same season of the year. The bright gold foliage. All around us is unchanged, and as our musing forty unconsciously takes in each particular object, and arranges them with all her quaintness; when once brought together, she calls up from the shadowy past the "old familiar faces" that we loved so well. For awhile we are happy; for now every thing is as it used to be.

But I cannot speak of the terrible revulsion of feeling which overwhelms us when we find we were but dreaming; when echo can only repeat our vain cry of lamentation, and the voices that never spoke to us but in accents of fondness, are hushed and silent forever. It may be, my reader, you have felt this agony; and a feeling so intense and so unfeigned cannot be tranged forth in words, it is too much one of those deep indentations of the heart.

Never more! I living friends save at this allgolorious period of the year. Give every indulgence to winter; speak of the cheerful hearth, the fire of contentment, the joyful meeting of friends—to its fullest extent will I acknowledge the greatness of these claims. But for me the gladsome day, when

"Life simply is luxury."

doth call a thousandfold more for the few I love. My pulses have in them more of life; my heart is more open to sympathy; and my first emotions, as I go forth, is a yearning for their presence, and when this hope is frustrated I can scarcely say, "I never feel so lonely as when the sun shines upon me most brightly!"

Everlasting memories of by-gone hours, which the faithful heart has throughout all its journey, cherished and nourished itself upon them as the camel in the desert on the cooling streams it has drunk in days before.

ANCIENT EXAMPLES IN LAW.

FROM THE LAW REPORTER.

At Paris, one morning a hungry poor man, 'begging his alms from door to door, did at the last espy very good cheer at a cook's house, whereat his mouth began to water; and the spur of his stomach pricking him forward, he made so much bone bower toward the place as his feeble feet would give him leave: where he was no sooner come, but the pleasant smell of the meat and sauce, did catch such hold of the poor man's nose, that, (as if he had been holden with a pair of pincers) he had no power to pass from thence, until he had (to stay the fury of his raging appetite,) eaten a piece of bread which he had of charity gotten in another place. In the eating whereof his sense was so delighted with the fresh smell of the cook's meat, that though he did not lay his lips to any morsel thereof, yet in the end his stomach was so well satisfied with the smell thereof, that he plainly acknowledged to have gotten as good a breakfast as if he had there eaten his belly full of the best cheer. Which when the cook had heard, (being an egregious wrangler) he in haste steps forth to the poor fellow, lays hold on him, and in a choleric mood bids him pay for his breakfast! The honest poor man amazed at his strange demand, could not tell what to say: but the cook was so much the more earnest, by how much he perceived the good man to be abashed at his boldness; and did so cunningly cloak the matter, that in the end the poor man was contented to refer the deciding of the controversy to whatsoever person should next pass that way, and abide his judgment. Which thing was no sooner concluded, but by and bye cometh to the place a very ancient man, and such a notorious idiot as in all Paris his like was not to be found. All the better for me, said the cook; for more he doubted the sentence of the wise man than a fool. Well, sir, to be short, the matter being at length opened to the ancient man, the cook complaining, and the other patiently confessing as before. A great multitude of people were gathered about them, no less desirous to know what would follow, than the cheerfulness of the matter did seem to promise. Whereupon, this natural perceiving what money the cook exacted caused the poor man to put so much money betwixt two basons, and to shake it up and down in the cook's hearing which done he bids the old ancient, that the poor man was satisfied with the smell of the cook's meat so the cook should be recompensed with the noise of the poor man's money. Which judgment was so commended that who heard the matter, thought, if Cato or Solon had been there in a matter of controversy, and if the poor man's son that transcends all other affections of the heart. It is neither to be chilled by selfishness, nor daunted by danger, nor weakened by worthlessness, nor stifled by ingratitude. It can endure poverty, scorn, and inconvenience; she will surrender every pleasure to his enjoyment; she will glory in his fame and exult in his prosperity; and if adversity overtake him, he will be the nearer to her heart on account of his misfortune; and if he bears a name that cannot diminish the estate, because no sin can reach it.

If it from the one, not the possession of talents, that wins her in life; the exertion of very moderate parts outweighs the indecision of the brightest. Men possessed of the first, do things tolerably, and are satisfied; of the last, forbear doing things well, because they have ideas beyond them.

The flower enamoured of the sun,
At his departure, hangs her head, and weeps,
And shrouds her sweetness up, and keeps
Red vigil, like a disbanded nun.
'Till his returning ray appears,
Waking her beauty as he dries his tears!—Tuke.

SINCERITY is an oppenness of the heart which is rarely to be found; that which commonly personates it is a mere dissimulation, whose end is to procure confidence. A desire to talk of ourselves, and to set our faults in whatever light we choose, makes the main of our sincerity.

BE LOTH to delight in the misfortune of others; the bitter cup of affliction sweeted; all the injuries of the world alleviated; and the sweetest flowers plentifully strewed along the most thorny paths of life.—Zimmermann.

UNCLE TOBY.—He shall not die, by God!

ON SCENES of public sorrow and national regret we gaze as upon those gallery-pictures which strike us with wonder and admiration: domestic calamity is like the sudden and unexpected stroke of a thunderbolt, which leaves scarcely time for a prayer.—Johnson.

IT IS a very common mistake in judgment, and a very dangerous one in conduct, first to look for nothing in the argument proposed to us but the motive of the man who uses it, and then to measure the truth of his argument, by the goodness or badness of his motive.

ANTICIPATION naturally counterfeits those excellencies which are placed at the greatest distance from possibility of attainment, because, knowing our own defects we eagerly endeavor to supply them with artificial excellence.—Johnson.

NOBILITY is a letter of credit given you by your country, to draw money on the security of your virtues; security that at a proper period of life, you will acquit yourself with honor for those engaged for you.—Mermontel.

THE extreme partialities of friendship, though founded on error should never be considered as the effusions of flattery, but as proofs of affection: those who use frequently excites vanity should strengthen esteem.

THE GROTTOGE.—Absurd images are sometimes irresistible. I will mention two. An elephant in a coach office, gravely coming to have his trunk booked. A mermaid over a fish kettle, cooking her own tail.

WEALTH commands the eye of beauty, and the ear of greatness; gives spirit to the dull, and authority to the timorous; procures friends, and supplies them with virtue and without understanding.—Johnson.

HE that would pass the latter part of his days with honor and decency, must, when he is young, consider that he shall one day be old; and remember, when he is old, that he once was young.—Johnson.

RELIGION refines our moral sentiments, disengages the heart from every vain desire, renders it tranquil under misfortune, humble in the presence of God, and steady in the cause of men.—Zimmermanns.

Who pants for glory, finds but short repose,
A breath raises him, and a breath overthrows.
Pope.

IN A few weeks the passion which had so long disturbed the peace of Laura was hushed by lasting repose; but it was the repose of the land where the whirlwind has passed—dreary and desolate.

MEN are in proportion wicked, as they are ignorant or envious; and the only means of eluding their mischievous intentions, is to keep out of their way.—Zimmermann.

IT is a man has a right to be proud of any thing, 'tis a good action, should it ought to be, that calms the agitations of interest lurking at the bottom of it.—Sterne.

MISUNDERSTANDING and matters can create more uneasiness in the world than deceptive and artifice, or at least, their consequences are more universal.—Goethe.

THE judgment and capacity which make resistance useless or impracticable, are rated much higher than even the resolution which overcomes it.—Jamine.

AFFLICTION is the wholesome soil of virtue, where patience, honor, sweet humanity, and calm fortitude take root and strongly flourish.—Mallet.

THE SECRET so pure, that I thought Heaven borrowed her fair form for valor's sake to wear, to gain her lovers with the cause of man.—Young.

VIOLENT asseverations, or affected bluntness, look not more suspicious than strained sanctity, or over offended modesty.—Zimmermann.

HE was brave, violent, and weak of intellect, the three most essential qualities to influence a man, either to send, or to accept a challenge.

THERE is a mean in all things. Even virtue itself has its stated limits, which, not being strictly observed, it ceases to be virtue.

NEVER was that man merry that had more than one woman in his bed, one friend in his bosom, one faith in his heart.

WHEN GOD speaks of commanding virtue, it is with exhorting life. Like happiness, it needs sought but pertinacity.

A JEW is a phrase that seems suited for every soil, and generally thrives best where the pruning knife is most applied.

THE IGNORANT's exaltation of anticipated success is often a powerful obstacle to its attainment.—Bissett.

A GOOD name is the emblazoning of the virtuous to an eternity of fame and gratitude among posterity.—N.

HYPOCRISY is the necessary harbinger of villainy.—Affectation the chosen trappings of folly.—Johnson.

AN INJURY sharpened by an insult, be it to whom it will, makes every man of sentiment a party.

THERE cannot be a greater treachery, than for to whom it is a confidence, and then betray it.

TO ACCOMPLISH much, a man must live as if he were immortal.

TO FORGET our benefactors is in a manner to make them.

The Olio.

MINGUILLO.

Stay for kissing thee, Minguillo,
My mother scolds me all the day,
Let me have it quickly, darling,—
Give me back my kiss, I pray.
If we have done naught amiss,
Let's undo it while we may,
Quickly give me back the kiss,
That she may have naught to say.
Do—she keeps so great a bother,
Chides so sharply, looks so grave,
Do, my love, to please my mother,
Give me back the kiss I gave.
Out upon you, false Minguillo!
Can you give, but two you take;
Give me back the two, my darling,
Give them for my mother's sake.

CREDIBLE STORY.—A late German newspaper gives the following credible narrative:

In an imperial city, lately a criminal was condemned to be beheaded, when had a singular itching to play at nine-pins. While his sentence was pronouncing he had the temerity to offer a request to be permitted to play once more at his favorite game at the place of execution, and then he said he should submit without a murmur. As the last prayer of a dying man, his request was granted. When arrived at the solemn spot, he found every thing prepared, the pins being set up and the bowl being ready. He played with no little earnestness; but the Sheriff at length, seeing that he showed no inclination to desist, privately ordered the executioner to strike the blow as he stooped for the bowl. The executioner did so, and the bowl dropped into the culprit's hand as he raised himself to see what had occurred; he immediately aimed at the nine, conceiving that it was the bowl which he grasped. All nine falling, the head loudly exclaimed, "By G—d I have won the game."

ANECDOTE OF T. C. GRATTAN.—Mr. Grattan is a large sized man, of more than middle age, and of rather peculiar personal appearance. His nose, so far from having any royal prominence, is quite the reverse, being flat. We have heard it related that a landlady with whom he once boarded took an uncontentable dislike to him at the first interview. He remained an inmate of her family a considerable time, and on quitting her residence her landlady received to tell him what had been her feelings at first, very cautiously contrasting them with her subsequent impression. "It was a long time, Mr. Grattan," said she, "before I could get over your nose." "That is not to be wondered at, Madam," he replied, "for there is no bridge to it."

PSALMS AND HYMNS.—A late number of the Glasgow Courier says, that a maiden lady, suspecting her female servant was regaling her been upon the cold mutton of the larder, called Betty, and inquired whether she did not hear some one speaking with her down stairs. "Oh, no sma'am," replied the girl, "it was only me singing a psalm." "You may amuse yourself, Betty," replied the maiden, "with Psalms; but let's have no Hymns, Betty; I have a great objection of Hymns." Betty curtsied, withdrew, and took the hint.

A REPARTEE.—A good bit of wit once transpired in our House of Legislature, which perhaps has not yet appeared in print.

"Sir," said the member from Assumption, "I am here the proud representative of my constituents; I am from the Parish of Assumption, and while I stand upon the floor, I said Assumption are of a piece."

"Yes," said an honorable member opposite, "and you are the—of a piece of Assumption that ever was heard of."—Pittsburgh.

LEG ANTIQUE.—A good story was recently told at a social gathering in New Hampshire. A stranger came up to a Washington-man with the enquiry, "Can you tell me where I can get something to drink?" "Oh, yes," said the other, "follow me." The man followed him through two or three streets, till he began to be discouraged. "How much farther must I go?" said he. "Only a few steps further," said the Washingtonian, "I think the pump!" The man turned about and vanished.

THE HAPPY FAIR.

Says Dick to Jack, "Your neighbors say
You wrangle with your wife each day."
"Pos, pos," says Jack,—"they only joke,
"Tis now a fortnight since we spoke."

A CHANNELS ANECDOTE.—A young democrat, taking a liking to a whig lady, backed up and pressed suit. One evening, (several young whigs being present,) she asked him if he was not afraid to address such a strong whig as she was? "Why, no," he says, "you are but a log cabin on one side of my apron, and a hard cider barrel on the other. This was a stumper; but plucking up courage, says he, "well, sheet me the cost skin and I'm off."

THE LAST ban-mot in circulation amongst the wits of Paris is excellent. An author who had written several wretched tragedies was asked why he did not apply his talents to the composition of a comedy. "Because," he replied, "other comedy where I had not the temerity." "What a pity," answered his tormentor, "that you never read Racine."

ANECDOTE.—An old gentleman of eighty years having taken to the altar a young damsel of about sixteen, the clergyman said to him "The fool is at the other end of the church." "Why, sir," said the old fool, "I required the old gentleman. "I beg your pardon," said the clerical wit. "I thought you had brought this child to be crossed."

RAINS IN GRASSE.—Rev. Dr. Olver, writing from Grasse, says "there are not fifty miles of road in Greece which is capable of being made a fine carriage." We should think that the roads in Greece ought to be as "sick as the." Why, there is one part of it that is a perfect isle of Rhodes!

GOOD SLEEP.—There is said to be a woman in Worcester so large, and who sleeps in a room so small, that she is obliged to go into another room to turn over. There is also a family in that town so large that they couldn't all have the measels at once; there wasn't enough to go round.

WELLBORN.—"Cousin" through the rye," as the whaling said when he was dutiful from the corn over. "You're a wag," as the dog said to his tail.

"An unconnected tale," as the rat remarked while viewing his nether extremity in a steel trap.

WHEN WE SEE birds at the approach of rain, anointing their plumage with oil, to shield off the drops, should we not remind us, when the storms of confusion threaten us, to apply the oil of forbearance, and thus prevent the chilling drops from entering our hearts.

REPORT FROM RHODE ISLAND.—A Miss Louisa Canton has, under the blessing of Providence, become the wife of one Herman Fiendell. She met Her-man, and married him on the same day, and at least one Canton has been Fiendell in Rhode Island!

"CAN THE tell which is my natal star?" asked a young gentleman, who designed to gain a young lady who was addicted to astronomy. "Yes," replied the lady, "it is the constellation cassiopia." "And what is the name of that?" "Cassy."

THE PICATUNE SAYS, that in Georgia a man receives promotion according to the number of Indians he has killed. A thousand gives him the rank of general—one makes a major of him—hence the number of Georgia majors.

AT THE ENTRANCE of one of the palaces of London, they are making a gate to be called "Albert's Gate," in honor of the King consort. This to be seen with the French, who have several Louis d'or's.

TENNER-HEARTED.—"Sam," said a tender-hearted mother to her dear little son, "what on earth did you throw the kitten into the well for?" "Oh, cut I essay." "Come to your ma, you little cherub."

SEAFARER'S PUN.—A poor coxsweinker out of work, and starving, thus ventured her miserable complaint—"Shame that I should be without bread; I, that have stayed the stomachs of thousands."

QUEER NOTIONS.—Greenlanders suppose that thunder is caused by two old women flapping seal skins in the moon; and the Aurora Borealis owing to the spirits of their fathers frisking at foot ball.

CELEBRATED LIP SALVE.—The best lip salve in creation is a sweet kiss. The remedy should be used in good action, daily, however, as it is apt to bring on an affection of the heart.

SIR DENNIS fell into apoplectic fits yesterday, in Royal street, on hearing that their tailor had determined to do a cash business. This is sad news; and will raise the price of strags.

AN OLD bachelor says, "If you see a man of woman, with little or no occasion, often finding fault and correcting, one another in company, you may be sure they are man and wife."

FLIRTATION.—A fashionable amusement for killing time, much in vogue everywhere, with old as well as young, played sometimes for sport, sometimes with forfeits.

"WHAT ARE you driving at?" as the little nigger chanted when the dray ran over him. "Two dollars a day and roast beef," said the drayman.

A BULL.—An Irishman cautions the public against harbouring or trusting his wife Peggy on his account, as he is not married to her.

SWEET.—A Western Editor says that nothing is sweeter than the warm and ardent kiss from one we love unless it is molasses.

ENGLISH GRAMMAR.—"Did a rain in-morrow?" asked the Dutchman. "I guess it was," replied the Frenchman.

NOT A BAD PUN.—"Bo-tanist," as the potter said to the lump of clay. "I'll be fuzzed first," responded the mud.

SOME PERSONS are so very quick of comprehension that they never really learn any thing.

TO ALLAY HUNGER.—Eat a pound of beefsteak, and a ten cent bed of bread.

EVERY BOOK, says Clarion, ought to live seriously, admonitorily and jocularly.

WORK OF MERCY.—Unhooking a young lady's frock to enable her to coerce.

DIFFICULT PROFESSIONAL.—Putting a stop to a woman's tongue.

A SECRET.—Any thing made known to every Body in a whisper.

REFLECTION.—Contemplating one's person in a looking-glass.

TO PRESERVE YOUR APPETITE.—Never go near the kitchen.

A MARTYR.—A gentleman subject to the gout.

GRAHAM'S
LADY'S AND GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

A New Volume.—July, 1842.

This work is designed, as its title indicates, for both ladies and gentlemen. It has a corps of writers unequalled in genius and reputation by those of any periodical in the old or new world. It is printed with new and beautiful type, on paper of the finest texture and quality, and

No Splendid Embellishments

are unsurpassed by any work have ever graced the periodical publications in our language. Indeed, in every thing connected with Art, Taste and Beauty, it is universally acknowledged to have led the way, and surpassed every magazine of the day. It is intended that in this respect the present volume shall excel all its predecessors; and extensive arrangements have, with that view, been entered into with the most eminent artists, for a profusion of costly illustrations of every description. In the department of the proprietor has the satisfaction to be able to state that he

Mezzotint Engravings,
